Reagan Will Name Anthony Kennedy To Supreme Court

By Lou Cannon
Washington Post Service
WASHINGTON — President Ronald Reagan has decided to name a federal appeals judge, Anthony M. Kennedy, 51, to the vacant seat on the Supreme Court. White House officials said Tuesday. They expressed confidence that the choice would prove popular and attract bipartisan support in the Senate.

Judge Kennedy had been identified earlier as Mr. Reagan's leading candidate to fill the Supreme Court post, but administration officials had said the choice was not yet certain.

The officials said Mr. Reagan decided to appoint Judge Kennedy after a half-hour meeting with him in the White House residence Monday that also was attended by the White House chief of staff, Howard H. Baker Jr., and Attorney General Edwin Meese 3d.

The announcement has been tentatively scheduled for Thursday. White House officials are expected to push for quick confirmation in the Senate.

Congressman Sees Budget Plan Soon

The Associated Press
WASHINGTON — The congressional leader of talks between the White House and Congress on cutting the U.S. budget deficit said Tuesday that an agreement was in sight, as the Democrats proposed a package of spending cuts and higher taxes they said would reduce this year's deficit by $28.5 billion.

"I think the pace of our discussions has picked up, and I'm optimistic we're going to get an agreement," said Thomas S. Foley, the House majority leader, as negotiators began another meeting.

Without an agreement between the White House and the Democratic-controlled Congress, on Nov. 20 the Gramm-Rudman deficit-reduction law will trigger $23 billion in spending cuts spread equally between domestic and military programs. The talks began two weeks ago.

an effort to fill a seat that has been open since July and overcome the embarrassment of two previous failed nominations.

The Senate Judiciary Committee chairman, Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, said, however, that hearings on the nomination were "probably not likely" before January.

Mr. Reagan is expected to try to mute the harsh political rhetoric that was a feature of the debate on both sides when Judge Robert H. Bork was rejected by the Senate on a 58-42 vote last month.

New battles broke out in Republican ranks Tuesday after the withdrawal of Judge Douglas H. Ginsburg, Mr. Reagan's second nominee. Judge Ginsburg withdrew after acknowledging that he had smoked marijuana as a Harvard professor as late as 1979.

Democrats and moderate Republicans blamed Mr. Meese, who pushed for Judge Ginsburg, for the debacle of a nomination that had to be withdrawn nine days after it was made. Conservatives concentrated their fire on Mr. Baker, saying he forced Judge Ginsburg out.

On Monday, a prominent conservative, Senator Orrin G. Hatch, Republican of Utah, assailed as "gutless wonders" members of the White House staff, in remarks that seemed aimed at Mr. Baker but did not identify anyone by name.

Mr. Baker's defenders fought back Tuesday, led by a moderate, Senator William S. Cohen, Republican of Maine, who compared the attacks on the chief of staff to a mugging "on the back stairs of the White House."

Judge Kennedy has been a member of the 9th U.S. Court of Appeals in California since President Gerald R. Ford appointed him in 1975. He has long-standing, if not especially close, ties to Mr. Reagan.

He also has strong support from some conservatives who are in and close to the Justice Department and who were once his law clerks.

Judge Kennedy is a judicial conservative, but his style is that of a pragmatist. Those familiar with his rulings say his style resembles that of Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr., the centrist whose retirement from the court created the vacancy.

Electricity Sabotaged In Sri Lanka

Compiled by Our Staff From Dispatches
COLOMBO, Sri Lanka — Power lines and railroad tracks were sabotaged Tuesday as Parliament met amid tight security to discuss legislation that would give limited autonomy to regions dominated by the Tamil minority group.

The attacks came a day after a bomb exploded outside a police station in Colombo's busy Maradana district, killing 32 persons and injuring more than 100.

As legislators at the Parliament complex on an island in a lake near Colombo discussed limited autonomy for Sri Lanka's three million Tamils, eight armored cars patrolled the six-mile (10-kilometer) route to the building, and naval vessels patrolled surrounding waters.

The chairman of Sri Lanka's Electricity Board, K.K.Y.W. Perera, said opponents of the legislation were suspected of cutting power supplies to the southern districts of Galle and Matara, the central Badulla region and the north-central Medawachchiya district.

"A helicopter survey showed that several pylons in jungle areas were bombed," Mr. Perera said. He said there had been no immediate claim of responsibility.

Railroad ties on two lines into Colombo were uprooted, stranding thousands of people heading to work, the police said.

Railroad officials said that the lines had been repaired by Tuesday afternoon and that train service had returned to normal.

Gunmen ordered passengers out of two buses in a Colombo suburb and two in Galle, and the buses were burned; the police suspected members of the Janatha Vimukthi Peramuna, or People's Liberation Front. The shadowy, militant Marxist group is made up of Sinhalese, Sri Lanka's majority group.

The police said they suspected that the outlawed group was responsible for the blast Monday. The group vehemently opposes the autonomy legislation and the peace accord, signed in July by India and Sri Lanka, on which it is based.

The two bills that make up the legislation are aimed at ending a four-year guerrilla war by Tamils seeking a separate homeland. (AFP, UPI, Reuters)

Mystery of 'Israeli Hostages' Deepens; Abduction May Have Been a Blunder

By Barry Tribes
International Herald Tribune
A mystery surrounding eight hostages, including two children, who are claimed to be Israelis captured by Palestinian guerrillas deepened Tuesday, with no material evidence and no demands yet from the kidnapers.

The kidnapping appears to have been a blunder involving two Belgian brothers, their family and a French girlfriend who were bumping around the Mediterranean on a converted sardine boat and had nothing to do with Israel.

The mystery began Sunday in Beirut when a man identifying himself as Walid Khaleel and claiming to represent the Fatah Revolutionary Council called a news conference to announce that the hostages, whom he described as Europeans having dual Israeli citizenship, were captured aboard their boat.

The Belgian foreign ministry verified the identity of the Belgians whom Mr. Khaleel had named: Emmanuel Houtekins, 42, a mechanic, his wife, Godelieve Kets, 48, their children Laurent, 17, and Valerie, 16, and Emmanuel's brother, Fernand Houtekins, the owner of the Silko. The Houtekins family lived in Sanary-sur-Mer in the south of France.

The French government verified the French nationality of the sixth person identified by Mr. Khaleel: Jacqueline Valente, a divorced mother of daughters aged 5 and 6. Mrs. Valente, 30, also comes from Sanary-sur-Mer.

People who knew the Houtekins family and Mrs. Valente in France said all were of modest means and were Roman Catholics with no Israeli or Jewish connections.

Fernand Houtekins was a cook near the port of Toulon from 1981 to 1985, when he apparently met Mrs. Valente and bought the Silko. Identified as a yacht in early reports of the incident, it is a 43-foot (13-meter) sardine boat that was decommissioned and declared unusable after being involved in an accident. After repairs, it was re-registered under the Belgian flag.

On Tuesday the French government contacted senior Arab officials, the Belgian government and the Red Cross in an attempt to win Mrs. Valente's release, a foreign ministry spokesman said.

Mr. Khaleel said the hostages were Israeli spies and described their capture as a slap in the face for King Hussein of Jordan, apparently an effort to embarrass the king and undermine the Arab League summit conference that began Sunday in Amman, Jordan.

8 Reported in Good Shape
A man who said he was a spokesman for the Fatah Revolutionary Council said the group had discussed the well-being of the prisoners Tuesday with a representative of the Red Cross in Beirut and all were in good physical and psychological condition, Reuters reported from Beirut. The man refused to say whether the Red Cross delegate saw the captives.

Poland Says Solidarity Militant Is Held

WARSAW (AP) — The police have captured Kornej Morawicki, the last major underground Solidarity leader and a fugitive since the 1981 martial law crackdown, the government announced Tuesday.

Mr. Morawicki, leader of a militant faction of the banned trade union movement, was arrested Monday night at an apartment in Wrocław, in southwestern Poland, said Jerzy Urban, the government spokesman.

A 46-year-old woman identified only as Hanna L. was arrested with him, Mr. Urban said. He said Mr. Morawicki was being investigated on suspicion of smuggling and possessing false identification papers. Mr. Morawicki's daughter, Anna, said that her brother, Mateusz, a university student, also was seized.

U.S. Reports on Late Airline Flights

WASHINGTON (AP) — Almost one-fourth of the major U.S. airlines' flights arrived at least 15 minutes late in September, the Transportation Department announced Tuesday. It also reported that complaints from travelers about service had fallen for the second month in a row, dropping by one-third from September to October.

New statistics aimed at helping travelers choose airlines with the best service showed that American Airlines had the best on-time performance, arriving within 15 minutes of its schedule 84.5 percent of the time. Other airlines showing on-time arrivals of better than 80 percent were Southwest, Continental, Eastern and Piedmont. The average for the 14 airlines was 77 percent.

WORLD BRIEFS

Palestinian Student Killed in Gaza

GAZA (Reuters) — An Israeli settler shot and killed a 17-year-old Palestinian student in the Israeli-occupied Gaza Strip on Tuesday after demonstrators stoned his vehicle, witnesses said.

The incident, the latest in a spate of shootings of unarmed Palestinian demonstrators by Israeli occupation forces or settlers, sparked further unrest in the coastal strip. The witnesses said the girl, Intissar A Tar, was shot outside her high school in the Deir al-Balah refugee camp. She died on arrival at Shifa hospital in Gaza City.

Troops later used tear gas and fired in the air to disperse hundreds of protesting students carrying an outlawed Palestinian flag outside the Islamic University, the witnesses added.

Sihanouk May Meet Cambodia Leader

BANGKOK (NYT) — Prince Norodom Sihanouk is planning to travel to France this week and hopes that he will meet there before the end of the year with the Cambodian prime minister, Hun Sen, a spokesman for the prince said here Tuesday. He heads one of three armies battling the Phnom Penh regime.

The proposed meeting, for which no date has been set, has the backing of China, Japan and several Southeast Asian nations, the prince's office said. Asian diplomats said that China, which has supported the exiled Khmer Rouge militarily and politically, now accepts the possibility of a neutral, non-Communist government if that is what Cambodians want. Prince Sihanouk has said this is his aim.

It is not clear to what extent Hanoi, which installed the present Phnom Penh government in 1979, will allow the Cambodians to shape their nation's future. A withdrawal of about 20,000 of Vietnam's 140,000 troops in Cambodia has apparently been delayed. Cambodian rebel leaders say there may be a difference of opinion in Hanoi on war policy.

Kasparov Takes Lead in Chess Match

SEVILLE, Spain (Reuters) — The world chess champion, Garry Kasparov, took the lead Tuesday for the first time in his title defense against the challenger, Anatoli Karpov, with a victory in the adjourned 11th game. Grandmasters said that Mr. Karpov had blundered on his 35th move Monday.

Mr. Kasparov now leads 6-5 with three wins, two losses and six draws. The first player to win six games or accumulate 12.5 points will win the match.

percent approval rating. But by September, this rating had fallen to about 47 percent.

The poll was said to reflect continuing support for Mr. Garcia among the poor. The changing attitudes of both political elites and middle classes, however, can be traced in the press. A few months ago, newspapers were delighted to cover an unconventional president who could bombard the country with ideas and inject it with enthusiasm at the same time as displaying such eccentricities as singing boleros in public and flying in supersonic fighters.

Most recently, articles have questioned the financial circumstances under which he bought two houses and have criticized him for accepting $9,000 as an honorarium and in expenses after, as head of state, he made a speech to the Food and Agriculture Organization in Rome in November 1985.

Behind these attacks is the outrage felt by many Peruvians — "all those wealthy enough to have a bank account," as one banker put it — over the nationalization of the banks and the heavy-handed pressure then applied by the government against Congress and the judiciary to ensure approval and enactment of the measure.

Although the Supreme Court must still rule on the constitutionality of the nationalization law, the government dispersed protesting bank workers last month with tear gas and used the police to evict directors of two banks and install its own administrators in their offices. The controversy has proved politically counterproductive because the government has succeeded in resuscitating conservative political parties that in the 1985 elections won only 17 percent of the vote, compared with 48 percent for Mr. Garcia's American Popular Revolutionary Alliance, and 23 percent for the Marxist United Left coalition.

In the weeks following the announced nationalization, tens of thousands of people turned out for three huge demonstrations, organized by a movement called Freedom and led by the novelist Mario Vargas Llosa, that sought to mobilize the country against what it called "the beginning of totalitarianism in Peru."

Paradoxically, while seemingly aimed at proving the president's revolutionary credentials, the bank nationalization also backfired by failing to win over the left. Asserting that the government had been willing to negotiate with the bankers, the United Left declared the Garcia administration — rather than the right — last month to be its principal foe.

Yet perhaps Mr. Garcia's most serious political challenge is now being posed by his own party. The American Popular Revolutionary Alliance controls both houses of Congress, but its leaders are resentful that Mr. Garcia variously ignored them, overruled them, and browbeat them when his popularity was such that he could rule the country on his own.

Protesters Block Work On Italian Nuclear Plant

The Associated Press
ROME — Anti-nuclear protesters blocked construction work on a nuclear power plant northwest of Rome on Tuesday, a day after voters overwhelmingly approved referendums curbing the development of nuclear energy.

The Italian news agency ANSA said more than 100 young people blocked the entrance to the construction site at Montalto di Castro, near Viterbo, 40 miles (65 kilometers) northwest of Rome, and unfurled a banner reading "No to civilian and military nuclear energy."

The news agency said there were no immediate confrontations with the police.

Final results from the voting on Sunday and Monday showed Italians, by a margin of 4-1, approved referendums to limit expansion of nuclear energy. But the turnout of 65 percent of the 45 million eligible voters was the lowest ever for an Italian election.

The referendum proposals call for the abrogation of current laws and give the Italian parliament 120 days to enact substitutes.

Voters abrogated three laws on nuclear energy programs: one that provides subsidies to towns and regions that accept nuclear plants; another that leaves it up to a few cabinet ministers to decide on locations of nuclear plants; and a third that allows the state-run energy company, ENEL, to participate in foreign nuclear plants.

Government officials said the coalition was likely to interpret the referendums as votes to limit nuclear power to its current minor role, Reuters reported.

Another referendum overturning the law protecting magistrates from civil lawsuits was approved by 80 percent of the voters.

SUMMIT: Arabs Focus on Iran, Not Israel, in Amman

1960s, Arab nationalism, as articulated by the Egyptian president, Gamal Abdel Nasser, was the dominant political ideology of the Arab world. But Israel's victory over Egypt in the 1967 war punctured Nasserism forever.

This was replaced by Palestinian nationalism. The Palestinian guerrilla movement captured the imagination of the Arab world, which looked to the PLO to redeem its lost pride.

But the PLO's defeat in Beirut, Arab historians say, and its internal split after the summer of 1982, which exposed the corruption in its leadership, left many Arabs convinced that the organization was no different from any other Arab regime and that Mr. Arafat was no different from any other Arab leader.

At the opening session in Amman, Mr. Arafat, the only Arab leader Hussein did not bother to greet upon arrival, listened to the king's speech about the threat from Iran with the grim expression of a fallen idol.

So once again the Arab world is searching for an ideology. David Hirst, a veteran Middle East correspondent for The Guardian, the London daily, said his discussions with Arab intellectuals had persuaded him that the quest for democracy was, in many ways, replacing the Palestinian issue as the primary concern of the Arab elite.

But this quest must compete with another ideological alternative that is also gaining ground: Islamic fundamentalism.

Iraq Says Planes Hit Tanker

United Press International
MANAMA, Bahrain — Iraqi planes flew Tuesday to the Iranian coast and attacked a "large naval target" in another attempt to cut Iranian oil exports, the official Iraqi news agency reported.

A military spokesman in Baghdad said the Iraqi jets scored "direct and effective hits" on the "naval target" at 10:35 A.M., the agency said.

"Naval target" is Iraq's term for an oil tanker in Iranian service. The raid was mounted "with the aim of cutting Iranian oil exports" that finance the war against Iraq, the spokesman said.

The planes returned safely to base after the attack, the spokesman said. It was the second time in 24 hours that Iraq claimed it had attacked a tanker carrying Iranian oil.

Manila Seeks Asian Support of U.S. Bases

By Barbara Crosser
New York Times Service
KOTA KINABALU, Malaysia — An unexpected bid by Manila to forge a common Southeast Asian policy in support of U.S. military bases in the Philippines has brought consternation to neighboring capitals, according to regional officials and private analysts meeting here to discuss Pacific security.

Officials at the 16th Williamsburg Conference on Asia and the Pacific said Monday that they were taken by surprise by an apparent effort by the Philippines foreign secretary, Raul Manglapus, to get regional backing for the continued presence of the U.S. bases.

[On Tuesday, Mr. Manglapus said any new agreement allowing the two major U.S. bases in the Philippines to remain would have to adhere to clauses in the new Philippine Constitution limiting nuclear weapons. Reuters reported from Manila.]

[The Philippine Constitution bans nuclear weapons "consistent with the national interest," in a policy that has never been fully spelled out. The present bases agreement expires in 1991, with talks to begin next year over terms of a possible new treaty.]

Mr. Manglapus has just completed a tour of Thailand, Malaysia and Singapore, three of Manila's partners in the Association of Southeast Asian Nations, ostensibly to assure them that a meeting of the group can take place safely in Manila in December.

Indonesia and Brunei also are members of the association.

Regional governments are worried about the volatility of the atmosphere in Manila. Hours before Mr. Manglapus's trip, explosives were found in the conference center where the summit meeting, the third in the association's 20-year history, is to be held Dec. 14-16.

But most governments in the region have decided to go ahead with the meeting as a vote of confidence in the government of President Corason C. Aquino.

"It is very important for the region to support her," said Jusuf Wanandi, director of the Indonesian Center for Strategic and International Studies and a member of the Indonesian legislature, in an interview Tuesday. "This is a signal of her credibility."

Non-Communist Southeast Asian nations agree more or less that a U.S. military presence is desirable for a range of reasons.

But several governments, including those of Malaysia and Indonesia, do not want to harm their relations with the Nonaligned Movement, a major grouping of developing countries, and other organizations by making a public statement on the issue.

ASEAN nations also are committed to establishing what they call a "zone of peace, freedom and neutrality" in the region. The American bases have posed a problem for this concept, but there is reluctance to see them go because of the large Soviet military presence at Cam Ranh Bay in Vietnam.

"If the Americans left, who would fill the gap?" Mr. Wanandi asked. "The Soviet Union? China? Japan? It could create a whole new balance of forces in the region."

Filipino commentators attending the Williamsburg Conference said Mr. Manglapus's aim might be to internationalize the issue of the American use of Clark Air Base and Subic Bay Naval Station. This might help Mrs. Aquino extricate the issue from an emotional nationalistic debate in the Philippines.

Discussions about the economic, political and military situation in the Philippines played a major part in the security conference, in which more than 50 government officials, diplomats, business leaders and scholars from Pacific countries took part.

The annual conference is named for the site in Virginia of the first meeting, in 1971.

Participants in this year's conference, sponsored by the Asia Society of New York and Malaysia's Institute for Strategic and International Studies, came from Australia, Canada, China, Japan, New Zealand.

South Korea and the United States. Hong Kong also is represented, along with all the members of ASEAN except Brunei.

Philippine Nuclear Ban
Mr. Manglapus, in his comments on the U.S. bases, said at a news conference that if the U.S. bases stayed, "they will have to continue under new conditions provided for in the new treaty." Reuters reported.

Washington strictly adheres to a policy of neither confirming nor denying the presence of nuclear weapons on its warships or aircraft. A nonnuclear policy imposed by New Zealand in 1985 resulted in the severing of virtually all military contact with the United States, which had long been an ally.

Two bills pending in the Philippine Senate seek a ban on nuclear weapons, including their prohibition in Philippine territorial waters and airspace.

The Philippine bases, the biggest U.S. overseas bases, are regarded as strategically vital.

"We want to stay at Subic Bay," a U.S. Navy official said Monday in Washington. "For the foreseeable future and ever more."

Phone Rules Eased For Civil Servants

The U.S. government has decided that civil servants may make "necessary" personal calls on government telephones. The General Services Administration, the agency that manages government buildings and services, says this should make it easier to spot abusers who, for example, phone for horoscopes or gossip at length.

Federal employees previously were forbidden to make personal calls even in emergencies, a rule widely regarded as foolish and almost impossible to enforce.

Now employees may make calls to report illness, injury, travel delays or the need to work overtime. They may phone home briefly to check with a spouse, a child or a baby sitter. They may make essential calls to numbers that can be reached only during the day, like a dentist's office, a plumbing service or a bank.

Federal employees previously were forbidden to make personal calls even in emergencies, a rule widely regarded as foolish and almost impossible to enforce.

Now employees may make calls to report illness, injury, travel delays or the need to work overtime. They may phone home briefly to check with a spouse, a child or a baby sitter. They may make essential calls to numbers that can be reached only during the day, like a dentist's office, a plumbing service or a bank.

U.S. Worry on Arms Talks

Buildup in Soviet Forces in Europe Cited

By Joseph Fichett
International Herald Tribune
PARIS — The Soviet Union's offensive military power is growing in central Europe, and Moscow maintains an edge over the Western Alliance in most conventional weapons, the International Institute of Strategic Studies says in a report it plans to issue on Wednesday.

Although the Soviet leader, Mikhail S. Gorbachev, is apparently interested in cutting military spending, the report says, Soviet conventional forces show continued improvement, particularly Soviet main battle tanks and ground-attack fighters deployed against North Atlantic Treaty Organization forces.

The report, "The Military Balance, 1987-1988," changed its approach this year in weighing conventional strengths to fit better with conventional arms control proposals. It also modified some crucial phrasing to reflect more fully the institute's view that Soviet advantages in conventional forces have become more critical as the superpowers near an agreement to eliminate intermediate-range nuclear missiles in Europe.

The institute, an independent center on security issues based in London, says in the report, "The figures indicate substantial quantitative Warsaw Pact advantages in most major force components and in particular with those most associated with an offensive land campaign."

The most notable Soviet military gains, the report says, are quantitative and qualitative improvements in its tank force. A "generation gap" has opened up between the T-80 tank, which is supplied only to Soviet forces, and the T-72 tank, the best armor in other Warsaw Pact arsenals.

Reflecting the increasingly polarized political debate about conventional forces in Europe, the institute this year declined to make an overall judgment about the precise East-West balance in non-nuclear forces.

In previous reports on the military balance, the institute said that "the conventional military balance is still such as to make general military aggression a highly risky undertaking for either side."

Washington Post Service
MOSCOW — Mikhail S. Gorbachev could prolong his coming three-day visit to the United States by several days, a Soviet official said Tuesday.

U.S. spokesmen have reported that the Soviet leader's trip, scheduled to begin Dec. 7, is to end Dec. 10 or 11. But Kremlin officials are considering a longer stay, a Soviet official said. The three-day scenario is loose and subject to change, added the official, who asked not to be identified.

Other Soviet officials have indicated that in addition to the length of Mr. Gorbachev's visit, his program and general objectives and encouragement are the subject of intensive discussions at the Kremlin.

Aside from Kremlin officials, Raisa Gorbachev, the Soviet leader's wife, is involved in a discussion about possibly extending the visit, according to a Soviet source.

Soviet officials stress that the trip is a working visit. But they also have mentioned the possibility that Mr. Gorbachev may make a major speech before Congress or the United Nations General Assembly.

So Who's in Charge?

It was a funny ad that started in 1962: picture books called "Who's in Charge Here," showing political figures like Ronald Reagan with fake speech balloons on real photographs. In 1987 the title has stopped being funny. People are asking, on one issue after another: Is President Reagan truly in charge? They ask it about the Supreme Court; The Democrats regained the Senate last year, yet Mr. Reagan has twice renominated to the court vacancy with raw, stubborn partisanship. And they ask it about world financial fragility: Instead of eagerly flashing a reassuring bipartisan signal, the president answers vaguely, grudgingly.

Defeat the Bombers

Next Sunday will be the second anniversary of the signing of Anglo-Irish accords designed to promote peaceful resolution of conflict in Ulster. Last Sunday there was gruesome evidence that the violence continues. A huge bomb, which the Provisional wing of the Irish Republican Army admits to having planted, was detonated in the small town of Enniskillen in the midst of a crowd gathered to honor soldiers killed in the world wars. The explosion killed 11 people and wounded more than 60 others, including more than a dozen children aged between 2 and 15. It was the worst single act of violence in the province in five years.

Meese's Startling 'O.K.'

The defendant before federal Judge R. Allan Edgar was the son of a congressman, so pleas for leniency from influential quarters could be expected. The behavior of Edwin Meese, Ursula's husband and the attorney general of the United States, remains as startling.

Kingmakers or Muckrakers?

The United States has suddenly found itself in the grip of a highly selective and deeply destructive moralism which would be ludicrous if it did not threaten to make nomination to the Supreme Court as hazardous a matter as declaring oneself to be a presidential candidate. The conservative Judge Douglas Ginsburg stood down this weekend after two liberal newspapers, normally much interested in journalistic ethics and personal privacy, revealed that, as an academic at Harvard Law School, a decade ago, Mr. Ginsburg had been an occasional user of marijuana. This sort of muckraking, which likes to pass as investigative journalism, is fast becoming a bar to candidacy for high office.

Americans would do well to recall the words with which Gary Hart bowed out: "I was not," he said, "running for sainthood." He might have added that public servants as distinguished as Franklin Roosevelt, John Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson would not have passed the morality tests now imposed on presidential hopefuls.

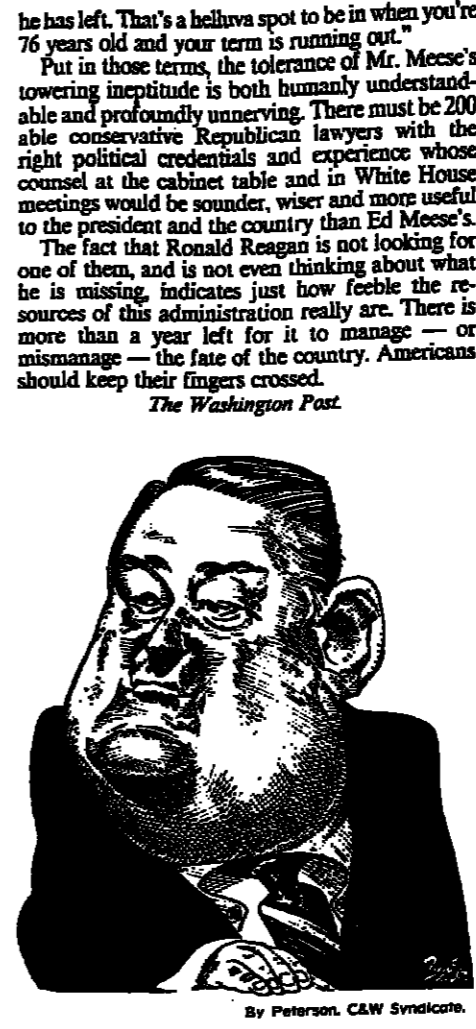

The news media have become political kingmakers of a sort, and have some reason to feel nervous about the role. They did not ask for the job; it fell to them by default. Yet they risk being caught in a backlash, even when they perform responsibly. Nowadays, whether a candidacy gets off the ground depends largely on the candidate's ability to project the desired traits through the media. Candidates failing the test will have difficulty attracting contributions and volunteer workers. Like it or not, the press has no responsible choice but to keep performing the function. If it does not inform people, most voters will be left in the dark.

The Attorney General Should Have Resigned

By David S. Broder

WASHINGTON—In any other democracy in the world, a cabinet official who subjected his chief, his party and his cause to the enormous embarrassment that Attorney General Edwin Meese caused President Reagan, the Republicans and the conservative movement last week would be out of a job. He would not have to be asked to resign. He would know it was his duty. But in his administration Mr. Reagan neither expects nor enforces any standard of accountability—especially toward such loyal old friends as Mr. Meese.

for the job and was not vulnerable to the liberal counterattack that sank Judge Robert Bork. Mr. Meese did so in the face of the fact that Judge Ginsburg had an extremely sketchy record: no private law practice; one hour of courtroom argument on one case; the lowest passing rating from the American Bar Association for appointment to a lower-level judgeship; and only one year of judicial service, with fewer than 20 opinions, as a member of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

To Protect The Nation, Draw Lines

By Flora Lewis

LOS ANGELES—One after another, the names are pronounced and collapsed. For Judge Douglas Ginsburg, it was startling, although there was nothing in his record to show he had the experience and wisdom to qualify him for the Supreme Court.

President Reagan's response was "Do what you think is right," which the White House said, when Education Secretary William Bennett wanted to tell Judge Ginsburg to withdraw because his nomination was hurting the administration. That is strange from the man with the constitutional responsibility for the nomination.

As Senator Albert Gore, who admitted that he used marijuana at one time, has said, "There have to be some lines establishing the rules of privacy drawn somewhere." The human price of daring to offer oneself for public service is soaring as wildly as the financing cost of campaigning.

To non-Americans, it is a bewildering display of the political ethos gone berserk. Many are tempted to pit it down to provincial American puritanism, making for an unsophisticated, awkward, inflexible political culture. Others cite it as proof that the United States is unpredictable, and less than a reliable partner in the complex business of dealing with the world.

They find that it shows a peculiar understanding of the purpose of politics and government, which is to enable societies to function effectively. There is a striking contrast between the widespread indifference to management of public affairs that is shown in regularly low voter turnouts, and the almost prurient attention to the intimate histories of those who do present themselves for public approval.

1887: Gloom in Berlin

BERLIN—The Berlin bourse today [Nov. 10] approaches a panic. Brokers and investors breakfasted on tidings about the Crown Prince, which convinced the bourse that cancer was destroying his life. With luncheon came the action of the Imperial Parliament in refusing to accept Russian bonds as security for loans. Later, while stocks were staggering news was brought of questions addressed by the police to all Russians who resided in the German Empire. So oppressively minute are these questions that in case of a war, or of expulsion of all Russians from Germany, nothing more exhaustive could be desired.

1912: A Port for Serbia?

ST. PETERSBURG—Russian diplomacy is determined to support Serbia in her march to the Adriatic. A peaceful solution is still possible, and it is premature to speak of a Russian ultimatum. If Austria-Hungary maintains her present attitude, however, a conflict is to be feared.

The Federal Chamber, the Senate, the State Legislatures and all municipal councils have been dissolved. The establishment of dictatorship has taken the country by surprise, although political circles have been feeding for some time that Dr. Getulio Vargas would find means to remain in the Presidency despite the fact that the old Constitution did not permit his re-election last year.

A Divided Korean Opposition Risks Defeating Itself

By Han Sung Joo

SEOUL—Kim Dae Jung, a man who has struggled long and suffered much for democracy in South Korea, kept others guessing for weeks, but few in the country doubted that he would run for president. Now he has not only declared himself a candidate in the December election, but formed a new party. He campaigns vigorously and attracts large crowds. He has aroused both hopes and fears that he might become the nation's next president.

The irony is that those who welcome his candidacy include his former oppressors, while those who regret it include many of his former political allies. Kim Dae Jung's candidacy is welcome news to backers of the ruling Democratic Justice Party. The election chances of Roh Tae Woo, the ruling party's chairman and presidential candidate, have vastly improved as a result. It was probably the calculation that Kim Dae Jung and his rival in the opposition camp, Kim Young Sam, would not be able to agree on a single candidate that led the ruling party to agree in June to a direct presidential election. Kim Dae Jung's ambitions indeed proved stronger than his stated goal of ending military rule in South Korea.

Kim Dae Jung underestimates the strength of the ruling party and overestimates his own. It may be that in a straight vote of confidence most electors would oppose the ruling party. There was evidence of this in the weak vote for the Democratic Justice Party in the National Assembly elections of 1985.

But under the newly adopted electoral system, a presidential candidate can win even if he is opposed by a majority of the electorate, provided their vote is split between two or more candidates. The ruling party seems assured of at least a third of the votes, with the possibility of gaining more because of Mr. Roh's personal popularity and public disaffection with the bickering of the opposition leaders. And the race is a four-way one now that Kim Jong Pil, a former prime minister, has declared his candidacy. A last-minute compromise between the two opposition Kimms on a single candidacy is possible but not likely.

A divided opposition is in many ways bad news for supporters of South Korean democracy. The rivalry between Kim Dae Jung and Kim Young Sam not only diminishes opposition chances, it makes it likely that the next president, whoever he is, will be elected by a minority. This does not bode well for a new government that inevitably will face challenges to its legitimacy.

Since each candidate knows he can win by securing firm support from a minority, campaigns will be conducted to maximize regional and partisan appeal, rather than to obtain broad support. This will further fragment South Korean politics, which are already afflicted by sectionalism. Achieving reconciliation after the elections will be difficult.

But there may also be some benefit for South Korean democracy. The candidacies of Kim Dae Jung and Kim Young Sam will give the ruling party a measure of confidence that it can win in a fair election. This is likely to help Mr. Roh's party resist temptations to tamper with the election or to interrupt the transition to democracy. As Kim Dae Jung contends, his failure to run could churn up frustration and anger among supporters, who would have felt that their man had been robbed of the opportunity to win power. The strength of his support needs to be tested in the voting booths, not on the streets. Nothing short of an honest election in which Kim Dae Jung takes part will resolve this predicament.

Good news or bad, Kim Dae Jung is running. Difficult as it is, the country will cope—by defeating or electing him at the polls.

The writer is a professor of politics at Korea University in Seoul. He contributed this comment to the International Herald Tribune.

No, the Others Will Feed Off One Another

By Kim Dae Jung

The writer is the presidential candidate of the new Korean Party for Peace and Democracy.

SEOUL—Since June, when Roh Tae Woo, the candidate of the present military government, announced his conversion under popular pressure to favoring a democratic election, there has been hope in some foreign circles that this is one military dictatorship that can put down its guns and keep power through the ballot box. This delusion has been encouraged by the candidacy of two opposition candidates. It is thought that we will split the anti-government vote.

Not so. If the government can be forced by Korean and international public opinion to hold the free and fair elections that it has promised, it will lose. The legacy of years of extensive repression—killings, corruption, low wages for most and economic privilege for a very few—cannot be washed away by one gesture. Why can't Mr. Roh win honestly, given the much promoted argument that because Kim Young Sam is also a candidate, the opposition vote will be split? Ironically, the candidacy of Kim Young Sam, my colleague in the opposition, increases the size of my lead.

Today it is agreed by all political camps that the two areas of the country where I am strongest are my home region, the southwest, and in Seoul and surrounding cities. Together these areas hold more than half of the nation's voters. At the same time, I think my reputation last week in Pusan, the heartland of Kim Young Sam's support, demonstrates that my constituency knows no regional boundaries. In 1971, despite massive fraud, I received 46 percent of the vote in the presidential election. My constituency is secure and expanding.

Kim Young Sam and Mr. Roh will split the southeast, their home base, and lose the central region of the country to Kim Jong Pil, the fourth candidate. As a former prime minister, Kim Jong Pil will take votes nationally from Mr. Roh. So the three candidates are feeding off each other's votes, and strengthening my lead. The Korean government has banned opinion polls; it is peddling the misleading argument of a split opposition vote and it is manipulating local news coverage to downgrade the challenge it faces.

If for some unforeseen reason Kim Young Sam wins so much support that he emerges as the principal standard-bearer for the opposition, it goes without saying that I would step aside before the election and throw my support behind him. He would make a fine president.

Slow-Boat Diplomacy Will Get America Nowhere Fast

By George P. Shultz

The writer is U.S. secretary of state.

WASHINGTON—The formulation and execution of foreign policy have traditionally rested on four pillars: power, purpose, resources and human ingenuity. Today, when America's sense of national purpose is so clear, our power and resolve so firm and our involvement in world affairs so vital to our national security, it is painful to see the disastrous effect that budgetary cuts are having on America's capacity to conduct foreign relations. The costs to undo this damage will surely be much higher than any "savings" today.

Resource constraints are dictating an American withdrawal from world problems ranging from acculturation to terrorism, our Foreign Service officers are the first line of defense of the republic. The thought of having to thin out this defensive line is sobering. Yet last year the State Department was forced to close seven overseas posts; this year we are faced with decisions that may force further withdrawals of American presence—two embassies and 13 consulates.

In the face of stringent budgets, we have tried to cut things rather than people. Purchase of necessary equipment and furniture was delayed. Having exhausted these mechanisms, we now face the loss of services of 1,200 people—all this because of an anticipated $84 million budgetary shortfall. When the nation faces a budget deficit of nearly $150 billion, such an amount seems almost trivial.

When these major pillars of our policy-making capability are weakened, what impact does this have on U.S. national security and interests? Our presence abroad and our judicious use of resources around the world have netted impressive gains recently. Our personnel and programs are contributing to a worldwide resurgence of democracy and a turn by many toward free market economies. Our personnel represent U.S. interests, analyze and recommend, negotiate agreements, assist U.S. citizens and help friends. Can we afford to reduce this presence?

The curtailment of State Department operations is just part of a larger disaster looming in our overall international affairs budget, which includes the operating budgets of all the other foreign affairs agencies as well as our military and economic assistance programs. In fiscal year 1985, appropriations for international affairs were $2.7 billion. Today, under the fiscal year 1988 congressional budget resolution, only $1.72 billion would be available—a 24 percent cut. After inflation and exchange rate adjustments (a particular problem in maintaining diplomatic missions abroad), this reduction is even more severe.

Security assistance has been particularly hard hit, declining from $9.5 billion in fiscal 1985 to about $8 billion under the congressional budget resolution. Because Congress insists we use half a billion of this to fund the Guaranty Reserve Fund for foreign military sales—a bookkeeping transaction—the effective cut is more than $2 billion. After adjusting for earmarks mandated by Congress, we have had to cut or eliminate assistance to countries in which we enjoy base rights and military access agreements. We face outright elimination of important humanitarian and developmental programs in Africa and Asia.

A withdrawal by the United States from world leadership would have a negative snowball effect on our security. Countries that look to the United States for encouragement and support will be left empty-handed. Where the United States cannot produce, opportunities will be given to the Soviet Union, support for our interests from friends and allies will decline and initiatives we have taken will wither. The question we need to ponder is whether the United States, stripped of its capacity to respond effectively in a fast-changing world and withdrawing from world affairs, will be seen by our friends as relevant to their needs in the years ahead.

The debate is sometimes cast in bureaucratic terms or ascribed to a failure of management to curb waste. Surely the State Department, like other agencies, must strive to cut fat, as we have been doing. But the real issue is not a few dollars here or there. It has to do with our ability and willingness to continue to shoulder the burdens of world leadership. It has to do with the advancement abroad of our interests. It has to do with the struggle between freedom and totalitarianism. It has to do with our ability to pursue a foreign policy based on the pillars of power, purpose, resources and human ingenuity.

The challenge facing Congress and the administration is to work together to ensure that the pillars of our foreign policy remain strong. Working together means continuing our dialogue with Congress to improve our role as the world's leading force for progress, peace and human dignity. We need understanding and support from our legislators.

OPINION

It's Not Lie Detection, It's Mental Rape

By William Safire

WASHINGTON — Two million times a year, American citizens are subjected to "lie detector" tests. This explosion of the use of machines that catch the cool, practiced liar is the most blatant intrusion into personal freedom in the United States today.

The tests libel the truthful and are fooled by spies and pathological liars.

purpose is to frighten the applicant with the threat of being hooked up to some terrifying device and asked intimate questions. That is enough to scare off most people who have ever had drinking, drug, psychological or any other "problems."

No screening procedure could be more un-American than this advance exclusion-by-fear. Even when performed by FBI-trained polygraph operators, "lie detection" is mistaken too often to be accepted by most courts. The reason: When hooked up to intrusive machines, many of us sweat and tremble. That makes honest people seem like liars.

Although lawmakers know that the polygraph is not a device that measures truthfulness, they see it as more effective than a truncheon and hot lights to coerce a suspect into confessing. Employees use it the same way: to scare off applicants with any kind of guilty conscience. This modern third degree is an abuse in law enforcement, and an abomination when used by private corporations against people who have done nothing to warrant a search of their minds.

Last week the House of Representatives finally passed a bill making it unlawful for any private employer "to require, request, suggest or cause any employee or prospective employee to take or submit to any lie detector test."

Security guard companies are excluded, and industry lobbyists used the narrow score to exempt companies engaged in the manufacture or sale of drugs.

"We resisted all the others," says Representative Pat Williams of Montana. "The House has voted to rid us of nine out of 10 polygraph tests now being made."

But the House has passed similar legislation before, only to see it die in the Senate. The test now is in the Senate Labor Committee, chaired by Edward Kennedy, from whom we have heard so much recently about the right to privacy.

For too long, lawmakers have ducked responsibility on privacy rights by passing the buck to the Supreme Court. But we may be a decade from a decision, and in the meantime millions will be deprived of both rights and jobs. Why can't Congress act, as 22 states already have, to stop technocracy's merchants of sweat from plying their trade?

Senator Kennedy, new defender of the sanctity of the marital bedroom (although that area is not currently threatened), has long been programmed by his staff to proclaim his support of legislation defending the sanctity of the human mind.

But taking the lead requires courage. Plenty of ripped-off companies and a lobby of polygraph operators in Washington denounce such a law defending a job applicant's privacy as a "criminal's protection act." The Labor Committee chairman does not want to be out there by himself, or surrounded by Democrats. He has dithered for months, waiting for Republican Orrin Hatch to co-sponsor a Senate version of an anti-polygraph bill.

"I'm a libertarian on this matter," Senator Hatch tells me. "The question is: Do we allow society to coerce the vast majority who are honest to get at the few who are dishonest?" So — is he for this law? "Nobody should lose his job, or be denied the opportunity of a job, exclusively as a result of polygraphy, you should have reasonable corroboration."

However, he worries that "the whole business community will come unglued" if the legislation is passed as written in the House. Orrin Hatch is torn: On one hand is the plea from businessmen who say they lose $40 billion a year to employee theft; on the other is the example known to him of Senate staff aide Michael Pillsbury, wrongly stripped of his position by a botched polygraph exam.

When in doubt, revert to principle. If no reason exists to suspect a person of wrongdoing, he or she should not be made to fear a mental strip-search, least of all by a discredited device that libels too many truth-tellers and gets fooled by pathological liars and spies.

The battle for personal freedom is joined. The Senate should pass this privacy law; the new secretary of labor should enforce it vigorously throughout the world of commerce; and then we should deal with the proliferation of this medieval monstrosity within the government.

The Madness of the Creators Is More Manic Than Schizoid

By Charles Krauthammer

WASHINGTON — One of science's more mundane but useful services is to confirm what common sense and common experience suggest. At its most trivial, you get elaborate studies showing that good-looking people are better treated by strangers than ugly people. Well, yes.

But every once in a while you get a story that confirms people's intuition about something important, like the relationship of madness and creativity. Intuitively we know they are connected. We remember a crazy aunt who creative asset. Beyond that point, it is a catastrophe. For example, the high ("manic") phase of manic-depressive illness — the euphoria, the rush of energy, the racing thoughts — can initially be very creative. When I was practicing psychiatry, several of my manic patients refused treatment because they thrived on the creative rush and inexhaustible energy of the early phase of the manic attack.

Soon however, they thrived no more. Creativity turned into craziness. At some point the engine revved up a little too much, the activity became too frenetic, and the thoughts flew so fast that they no longer connected. That is when the patient turned up at the hospital, brought in by a cop or a frantic relative.

In the individual patient, it is not hard to see how thin is the line that separates creativity from gross disorganization. From society's point of view, this leads to a dilemma: There is a cost to curing madness. Were we to conquer manic-depressive illness the way we have conquered, say, polio and smallpox, we might find our cultures diminished. The twinning of madness and genius is such that eradicating the one may have unintended but predictable effects on the other.

A most extraordinary example of this twinning occurred in a genius with a different mental ailment. Dostoyevski was an epileptic. He described heavyweights as dead and not available for psychiatric interview. Dr. Andreason picked the next best sample.

She found an extremely high rate of mental illness in the writers, almost three times that of a control sample. Her most interesting finding, however, is counter-intuitive. We tend to think that genius is a blood relative of crazy thinking, the wild and bizarre kind that occurs in schizophrenia. The idea being that if you keep your visions and your voices under control, you produce a great novel; if they get out of control, you end up in the emergency room.

Dr. Andreason found that this was not the case. Her creative writers were not prone to schizophrenia, which is a disorder of thinking. They were prone to manic-depression, which is a disorder of feeling. Manic-depressives experience uncontrollable mood swings from euphoric highs to the deepest despairing lows, which can additionally lead to alcoholism, a kind of self-treatment, or suicide, the most terrible self-treatment of all. What the Andreason findings suggest is that creativity is related not to extraordinary modes of thinking but to extraordinary depths of feeling.

Related in a rather simple way. It is a question of degree. Up to a certain point, a six-octave range of feeling is a wrote poetry and the great artists who went mad or committed suicide. Indeed, the relationship is so well accepted that most of the debate is about the reason that craziness tends to genius and vice versa. But the assumption that one leads to the other is based on little more than anecdotal evidence.

Dr. Nancy Andreason, a rigorous and prolific psychiatric researcher at the University of Iowa, has set out to attach numbers to the intuition. Over 15 years, she studied 30 faculty members of the respected University of Iowa Writers' Workshop. This is not quite the same creative league as, say, Nabokov or Pound or the authors on the average college English curriculum.

But since most of history's creative heavyweights are dead and not available for psychiatric interview, Dr. Andreason picked the next best sample.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

These 'Invaders' Were Recruited by a Europe in Need

In response to "Belgian Aide Calls Muslim Immigrants 'Barbarians'" (Oct. 31) by Joseph Fitchett:

Joseph Michel, Belgium's interior minister, said that Belgians "risk being like the Romans — invaded by barbarians. The barbarians are the Arabs, the Moroccans, the Turks and the Yugoslavs."

But in the 1960s and early '70s, European recruiting agencies moved whole departments to these countries to recruit the manpower needed to turn the European industrial machine and to replace Europeans in "demeaning" jobs. These immigrants, lured by material advantages, abandoned their families, their land and even their social status to work in an environment that was utterly strange to them. Since their primary objective was to pump money to their families back home, they had to settle for austere living conditions. Europeans welcomed them then without taking much notice of how different they were.

Things have changed. Now Mr. Michel says that these are people "who come from very far away and who have nothing in common with our civilization." I am tempted to answer by evoking the story of Africans in the United States as a lesson, but it is a long one. I will simply say that human beings are not cattle — you cannot move them around without expecting to upset both your civilization and theirs.

It is time Europeans engaged in some constructive thinking on this problem. There are two alternatives, both expensive. One is to encourage immigrants to return to their native countries by offering substantial financial indemnities — the kind of bait that brought them to Europe in the first place. The other is to accept them as citizens and pay the price for their integration.

We should never have accepted the large-scale uprooting that took place before 1975 without any guarantees. We lost our dignity in exchange for hard currency. It is proving very costly.

Dealing With AIDS

Regarding "Fear, the Dark Bond Between One's Conscience and Bigory" (Meanwhile, Oct. 14) by Anna Quindlen:

The author has the right to mix with her friends as she wishes, but one questions the right to put her children into any situation that may carry an avoidable risk to their health.

One steers one's children away from polluted beaches, unpasteurized milk, strangers or even school friends who may have a contagious illness. We vaccinate them as protection and do not take them into areas where typhoid, smallpox or other diseases are prevalent.

For all the assurances about how it is transmitted, AIDS remains a communicable illness — and it is fatal.

I am involved in the arts and have many friends at risk from AIDS, but if I

A Revolution on Hold

Regarding "Telecommunications Revolution Highlights European Differences" (Special Report, Oct. 20):

Giles Merritt has missed an essential point about the development of a competitive European communications network: All the computerized equipment and high-technology mean nothing if one cannot obtain access to reliable telephone and telecommunications lines to transmit the desired information.

Here in Belgium, it takes three to six months simply to obtain an operating telephone line. A facsimile line takes nine to 12 months. The "technology revolution" will never be truly successful until such delays are eliminated.

The Drive of Mr. Salinas

Regarding the news report "Energy, Drive Mark Mexican Candidate's Career" (Oct. 6) by Larry Rohter:

Carlos Salinas de Gortari's nickname, Atom Ant, is said by Mr. Rohter to reflect "not only the traditional Mexican irreverence toward authority, but also . . . the energy, drive and persistence that are the main components of his public image."

The first part of this sentence makes no sense. The sobriquet comes from a cartoon show. The main character is an ant whose superpowers enable him to perform magnificent deeds, quickly and efficiently. I cannot see how it illustrates Mexicans' disrespect for authority. If anything, it shows humorous recognition for Mr. Salinas's achievements.

ISABEL DE LUIS DE MACEDO, Geneva.

Noise in the Neighborhood

Regarding the report "Neighbors Upset With U.S. Embry to Pretoria" (Oct. 28):

I have known Janice Farquharson, to whom the complaints of noise at the U.S. ambassador's home were attributed, for more than 30 years. She has a highly developed sense of criticism and I can testify to her powers of sarcasm and irony. But she cannot be accused of racism. If she complains of noisy weekend parties, she is entitled to.

If the embassy spokeswoman is correct that the complaint stems from construction noise, one may ask why work is being carried out over weekends. Senator J. William Fulbright piloted a successful bill through Congress some years ago to prohibit such construction by diplomatic representatives in residential areas in Washington. The essence of diplomatic relations is reciprocity.

Mobutu's Way: A Regime Based on Musical Chairs

By Blaine Harden
Washington Post Service
KINSHASA, Zaire — During a debate this year on Zaire's economic sickness, a number of professors from the University of Kinshasa made unflattering references to the leadership qualities of Mobutu Sese Seko, their president.

They spoke of misguided economic policy and corruption. Mr. Mobutu sat in on some of the debate, and afterward he asked that the professors be brought to him.

As the undisputed, all-powerful leader of black Africa's second-largest country, Mr. Mobutu had a number of opinions in disposing of the prickly academics.

He could have had them "rusticated" — a technique by which annoying minions are forcibly exiled to their rural villages.

He could even have had them hanged, as his government once hanged four former cabinet ministers who discussed the possibility of a coup.

But Mr. Mobutu chose the carrot, not the stick. He gave all the professors a healthy raise — junior faculty salaries jumped to $480 a month from $72; senior faculty salaries to $1,280 a month from $360. The teachers returned to the university, and there have been no more troublesome debates.

Of all the leaders of the 45 countries of sub-Saharan Africa, no one cuts the figure of Mobutu Sese Seko Kuku Ngbendu Wa Za Banga. He is fabulously rich. His fortune is estimated at $5 billion and includes 11 palaces in Zaire and assorted fancy houses in several European countries.

He is fabulously egotistical. His late mother has been transformed into a cult figure akin to the Virgin Mary, while he is called "the Messiah."

Yet, as his encounter with the professors demonstrates, Mr. Mobutu is no fool.

For the past 22 years, he has single-handedly manipulated the competing interests of 200 fractious tribal groups and 35 million people. On a continent cursed with coups and crawling with rebel armies, Mr. Mobutu presides over a nation in which there is thought to be no serious threat to his power. More than any leader in Africa, he has perfected the art of using power and money to keep the lid on.

"You can't even post the unity of Zaire without Mobutu," said one Western diplomat. "He essentially carved out a nation out of a territory carved out of the forest by the Belgians. It is so immense that it shouldn't even exist as a country."

"Mobutu does not make any enemies who can threaten him," said another diplomat, explaining how Mr. Mobutu has survived. "This is not a regime based on repression. It is based on palaver and compromise and buying off potential problems."

Conventional wisdom in Kinshasa says that, apart from Mr. Mobutu and his family, only 80 people in the country count. At any one time, 20 of them are ministers, 20 are exiles, 20 are in jail and 20 are ambassadors. Every three months, the music stops and Mr. Mobutu forces everyone to change chairs.

While oversimplified, the conventional wisdom does point to the essence of Mr. Mobutu's ruling style. From 1965 to 1975, only 41 of 212 senior government officials held high office for five years or more. In that period, 29 leaders went directly from ministerial positions to jail.

"Cumulatively, these devices constitute a powerful mechanism of informal intimidation and suggest why systematic opposition has never arisen within the top organs of the state," writes Crawford Young, an authority on Zaire and professor of political science at the University of Wisconsin.

Perhaps the best witness to Mr. Mobutu's management wizardry is the current Zairian ambassador to Washington.

In the early 1970s, Nguzza Karl I Bond served as Zaire's foreign minister and then as political director of the country's ruling party. But in 1977, he fell out of favor, was accused of high treason and sentenced to death.

Mr. Nguzza later told a U.S. congressional subcommittee that Mr. Mobutu personally threatened to shoot him. But instead he was tortured. Mr. Nguzza said torture techniques to which he was subjected included the application of electrical shocks to his testicles.

A year later, Mr. Nguzza was freed, and in 1979 Mr. Mobutu made him prime minister. Two years after that, he fled to exile in Belgium and wrote perhaps the most scathing indictment of Zairian corruption ever printed. He came to Washington and told the House subcommittee on Africa that Mr. Mobutu bled hundreds of millions of dollars out of government coffers and injected the money into a Swiss bank account.

Some time after that, Mr. Mobutu invited Mr. Nguzza home. And last year, to the astonishment of the State Department, Mr. Mobutu made him ambassador to the United States.

Last week, Mr. Mobutu did it again. Bearing gifts, he turned on his enemies. Three opposition politicians whom he had ordered jailed in 1983 for seeking to establish an opposition political party were appointed as members of the ruling party's central committee.

Mr. Mobutu, 57, grew up poor. His father was a cook for a colonial magistrate. His mother worked as a hotel maid. At the age of 19, he was booted out of missionary school for disciplinary problems and was conscripted into the colonial army.

He rose quickly to the rank of sergeant-major, relying on his good French and knack for making important friends. At 25, he left the army and became a journalist in Léopoldville, as Kinshasa was then called, where he made contacts with European patrons and a circle of ambitious men who were to become the elite of Zaire. He traveled to Belgium, where his biographers have noted he made contacts with operatives in the Central Intelligence Agency.

At Zaire's independence from Belgium in 1960, Mr. Mobutu was well positioned to become commander of the army. During the five years of anarchy and bloodshed after independence, Mr. Mobutu appointed people loyal to him to key positions in the military. Possessing a passion for power that was unmatched among his peers, he emerged in 1965 as undisputed leader of the Second Republic.

While many leaders on the continent have backed away from the conspicuous consumption that marked the early years of independent Africa, Mr. Mobutu has not.

He routinely charts a French Concorde for his world travels. According to diplomatic sources, government aircraft is dispatched regularly from the president's huge private farm in his ancestral home of Gbadolite to pick up plants in South Africa and livestock in South America. He entertains on a river boat that he seized from a government agency. He is, diplomats say, an unusually gracious, attentive and generous host.

"Mobutu simply does not believe that the millions of dollars wasted on the Concorde is money that could be put to good use in his country," said one diplomat.

Mr. Mobutu does spread money around. According to Mr. Young, the Zaire scholar, spreading money around is a key to Mr. Mobutu's survival.

In his book "The Rise and Decline of the Zairian State," Mr. Young writes: "To sustain the system, large patrimonial investments have been necessary to ensure the continuing loyalty of the presidential fraternity of close collaborators who staff the key agencies of the state and, above all, the security forces. To some extent the faithful have been permitted or even encouraged, to remunerate themselves by participating in similar schemes to intercept public money."

In the early 1970s, Mr. Mobutu turned over most foreign-owned businesses to Zairians, many of whom were friends of the president. Many of these businesses collapsed, and the country suffers from a chronic lack of small entrepreneurs capable of supplying goods and services in Zaire's vast interior.

To keep tabs on his unique system of government, Mr. Mobutu uses several competing intelligence networks. Diplomatic sources say he receives intelligence reports every six hours. They also say that Mr. Mobutu, after 22 years of shuffling and co-opting his subordinates, is still at the top of his game.

"He runs a bloody big country extremely tightly," said a European diplomat, whose opinion echoes that of many foreign observers in Zaire. "He is an awesome man, with aura and presence. I think the country is more stable and united now than at any time in the past 22 years."

Tunisian Pledges Political Changes

Reuters
TUNIS — Prime Minister Hedi Baccouche pledged far-reaching political changes on Tuesday, promising to create a multiparty state in Tunisia.

Mr. Baccouche, a long-time ally of the new president, Zine al-Abidine Ben Ali, was named prime minister early Saturday after Mr. Ben Ali deposed President Habib Bourguiba, who he said was senile.

"We are determined to make pluralism a reality," Mr. Baccouche said at his first news conference. But he dampened expectations that general elections would be held.

Flanked by numerous ministers, Mr. Baccouche repeated promises made by Mr. Ben Ali after he took power that laws against opposition parties would be reviewed and greater press freedom allowed.

Appearing to rule out swift elections, the prime minister stressed that the primary task of the new government was to build a national consensus in which political debate could take place.

"All those who conform to this will be allowed to set up political parties," he said. He added that the present parliament, which has a mandate until 1991, could decide to hold legislative elections.

Mr. Baccouche confirmed that Mr. Ben Ali would be a presidential candidate if there was an election. "He will submit himself when the time comes," Mr. Baccouche said.

The prime minister gave few clues as to how much political opposition would be permitted by Mr. Ben Ali's administration. But he hinted that it could include at least some Muslim fundamentalists. He noted that some fundamentalist groups had welcomed Mr. Bourguiba's removal from power.

Islamists "could undertake political activity, but first we must set up the conditions," he said.

Mr. Bourguiba's last years in power were marked by a vigorous crackdown on Islamic fundamentalist groups accused of plotting to overthrow the state.

In October, two men convicted of hotel bombings in tourist resorts were hanged.

Mr. Baccouche confirmed that the president-for-life clause in the Tunisian Constitution, under which Mr. Bourguiba had clung to office, would soon be eliminated.

Charles Holland, Tenor, Dies at 77

New York Times Service
NEW YORK — Charles Holland, 77, an American tenor who pursued his career primarily in Europe and was rediscovered by the American avant-garde late in life, died Saturday at his home in Amsterdam.

Mr. Holland, who was born in Norfolk, Virginia, had a promising career in the United States but felt that his opportunities were limited there because of racial prejudice.

In the United States he sang with Benny Carter's and Fletcher Henderson's jazz bands in the 1930s, appeared in musical theater and had a radio program on the NBC network. He then shifted his emphasis to classical singing, and appeared in Virgil Thomson's "Four Saints in Three Acts" and Marc Blitzstein's "Airborne."

In 1949 he moved to Europe, where his career prospered. He sang on French radio and television, made his debut at the Paris Opera in Mozart's "Zauberflöte" in 1954 and became the first black singer at the Opéra-Comique the following year. He sang Verdi's "Otello" in London and appeared throughout Europe in operatic roles and lieder recitals.

UN Assembly Backs Resolution Calling For Troop Pullout from Afghanistan

Reuters
UNITED NATIONS, New York — For the ninth time since Soviet troops intervened in Afghanistan in December 1979, the United Nations General Assembly called Tuesday for the immediate withdrawal of foreign troops from that country.

The vote on the resolution, sponsored by nearly 50 countries, was 123-19, with 11 abstentions, a record majority of 104. Last year, the vote was 122-20, with 11 abstentions. The resolution is almost identical to those previously adopted. It does not mention the Soviet Union by name and refers only to

"foreign troops" and "foreign armed intervention."

In the resolution's key paragraph, the assembly "calls for the immediate withdrawal of the foreign troops from Afghanistan."

The resolution reaffirms the right of Afghans to determine their own form of government and to choose their economic, political and social system free of outside intervention.

It calls for a political solution and creation of conditions enabling the estimated five million Afghan refugees, now mainly in Pakistan and Iran, to return voluntarily to their homes "in safety and honor."

The resolution also calls for continued UN efforts to work out a political solution in Afghanistan. Since 1982, the United Nations has sponsored talks between Afghan and Pakistani representatives in Geneva. They remain deadlocked on a timetable for a Soviet troop pullout.

Niger Leader Dies After a Long Illness

The Associated Press
PARIS — President Seyni Kountché of Niger died Tuesday in a Paris hospital, French sources said. He was 55.

Earlier in the day, the army chief of staff had announced he was taking control of the government.

General Kountché had been flown to Paris a half-dozen times in the past 10 months for medical reasons, although there has been no official explanation of the nature of his illness. The French news agency, Agence France-Press, citing a variety of sources, said he had been suffering from a brain tumor.

Niger radio reported earlier Tuesday that the army chief of staff, Colonel Ali Saibou, had taken control of the government because of the "very worrisome health" problems of the head of state.

The broadcast, monitored in Abidjan, Ivory Coast, said the nation's Supreme Military Council had made the decision, which would be in effect "until further notice."

General Kountché came to power in a 1974 military coup.

In June, voters approved a referendum on a national charter outlining national goals and objectives. The charter was four years in the making and was to serve as the model of a new constitution that was to take the place of the one suspended in 1974 when General Kountché took power.

No timetable is set for a return to civilian rule.

Niger, more than twice the size of France, its former colonial ruler, has a population of six million.

Western diplomats in the capital, Niamey, said the public became aware of the president's health problems in January when he had to be helped from the set during an appearance on national television.

Born in July 1931 in Fandou into a family of traditional leaders of the Gbada tribe, General Kountché received military training in Mali and Senegal before joining the French Army to fight in Indochina.

Returning to his homeland in 1961, a year after independence, he continued his military career.

In 1973, he was named army chief of staff, and a year later led the coup.

He then established the ruling 10-member Supreme Military Council, which he headed.

2 Bombs Rock Singapore District

Reuters
SINGAPORE — Two bombs exploded early Tuesday in Singapore's financial district, damaging commercial buildings but causing no casualties, the police said.

Later, a bomb threat was reported in a 12-story building housing the Israeli and Canadian diplomatic missions, but a search turned up no bomb.

A police spokesman said that no arrests had been made and that no one had taken responsibility for the bombings. The spokesman said a bomb shattered glass in the American International Assurance Building about midnight. A few hours later, a second bomb went off outside the Shell Tower, which houses commercial offices.

Hong Kong's Young Professionals Fleeing in Drove

By Nicholas D. Kristof
New York Times Service

HONG KONG — Four decades after their parents and grandparents swarmed from revolutionary upheaval in China to the safety of Hong Kong, young Chinese professionals are again fleeing Communism, packing their bags for Canada, the United States and Australia.

With fewer than 10 years remaining before Hong Kong is returned to the Chinese mainland, more and more of the British territory's brightest lights are deciding that they do not trust China to allow Hong Kong to remain capitalist, decadent and efficient.

This year more than 10,000 will say farewell to the "fragrant harbor," as this city is known in Chinese, and dolefully brace themselves for Canadian winters and other hardships still only dimly understood.

"People used to ask me vague questions about the future," said Wong Shi-keung, a traditional fortune-teller whose premises attract middle-class Chinese. "Now they ask more focused questions: 'Should I stay in Hong Kong after 1997?' or 'Will foreign countries offer brighter career prospects?'"

On July 1, 1997, it will be the marriage of the century: China, one of the most regulated societies in the world, enormous and sluggish; and Hong Kong, a monument to laissez-faire, a tiny, pulsating territory whose economy already dominates a broad swath of southern China.

The amalgam will have far-reaching implications for all of China, and even now, 10 years before the nuptials, expectations of what it will bring are transforming Hong Kong.

But it is an arranged marriage, and one that gives the 5.6 million inhabitants of Hong Kong deep reservations. The apprehensions, which seem to be a particular preoccupation of the middle class, are compounded by the belief that Britain and China are conspiring to thwart the emergence of democracy, so that Hong Kong will not develop political institutions that could challenge Beijing. The colony is now governed by officials appointed by Britain.

Iris W. Y. Lam, 30, a banker with an easygoing manner reminiscent of her student days at the University of Southern California, is one of those leaving. "My dad was in Shanghai in 1949, when the Communists took over," she said. "The Communists promised people freedom then, but they lost everything."

Miss Lam, who is to leave next month for Toronto, worries about finding a job and regrets having to leave the world she knows in Hong Kong. But she has no doubts about the wisdom of her decision to emigrate. In the United States, apparently more students proportionally than from anywhere else.

Until the end of September, the United States limited to 600 the number of Hong Kong-born people who could receive immigration visas in any year, not counting spouses and minor children of American citizens.

Many more visas were granted because many recipients were spouses or underage children of Americans, and because many were born in China but now live in Hong Kong. The limit was raised to 5,000 in the fiscal year that began Oct. 1. The United States gives preference to family members of Americans and to those with special skills.

Some of those going abroad will return to Hong Kong in a few years, clutching their new foreign passports. But immigration advisers say that as 1997 nears, more and more of the emigrants, especially younger ones, say they will build their lives abroad.

Although the brightest young professionals are unconvinced, many of Hong Kong's manufacturers are optimistic that China will allow Hong Kong to remain a place to make and keep money.

For Afghan Refugees in Pakistan, Welcome Mat Is Wearing Thin

By Michael Getler
Washington Post Service

SADDA, Pakistan — Eight years after millions of Afghans fled the Soviet intervention in their country, the refugees face the prospect of another upheaval, one not of their own making and out of their control.

An estimated three million Afghans, the largest refugee population in the world, have been settled in more than 350 refugee camps such as the Tindo camp at Sadda, in Pakistan's North-West Frontier Province, a few miles from the border with their homeland.

In addition, an estimated half-million "unregistered" refugees live outside the camps, jamming the streets, bazaars and outskirts of Peshawar, the provincial capital, and a handful of other towns.

Aid officials from Western and Islamic countries praise Pakistan's role in absorbing such a huge influx of people over the years and add that the assistance programs being run with the help of more than 50 relief agencies from a score of countries and the United Nations are not only the biggest but probably the most effective in the world.

Yet there are signs that the welcome mat is wearing thin. "The people are getting fed up now with looking after the refugees," said Ghulam Jatoi, head of the National Peoples' Party, a Pakistani opposition group.

The traditional welcome and giving of shelter to Islamic brothers from across the border is disappearing. "Remember," Mr. Jatoi said, "the Prophet Mohammed also said to make sure that you were not a guest for more than three days. So we have given them eight years."

This view, which seems to be shared by a growing number of Pakistanis, is due in part to the size of the refugee population, the duration of their stay, the strain on scarce local resources and the entrepreneurial instincts of many Afghans, who have cut in on Pakistani businesses and land, especially in the northwest.

It is also due partly to the war-related increase in gunrunning and drug smuggling that has made the traditionally wild northwest tribal areas even wilder. There are an estimated 650,000 heroin addicts in Pakistan, compared to perhaps only hundreds five years ago.

The sense of frustration is deepened by the lack of any solution to the seemingly endless, stalemated war between the Afghan resistance fighters, known as the mujahidin, and Soviet and Afghan government forces.

In the past year, an even more explosive incident has been added to this mixture.

Senior Pakistani officials and Western diplomats say they are convinced that an apparently effective new strategy of subversion and terrorist bombings, aimed at the Pakistani population and easily blamed on the refugees, is being directed by the secret police of the Soviet-backed government in Kabul.

This year, said a top Pakistani official familiar with detailed intelligence reports, more than 300 people have been killed and perhaps 1,000 injured in bomb blasts. The attacks, whose range has spread from the Peshawar area to the cities of Karachi, Lahore and Rawalpindi, almost always touch off demonstrations against the refugees. In the eyes of many Pakistanis, it is their presence that is causing the bombings.

The strategy, the official explained, is to drive the wedge even deeper between the Pakistani population and the refugees. The apparent goal is to bring enough pressure on the government, through the threat of destabilization, to force it to accept terms more favorable to Moscow and Kabul in U.N.-mediated talks aimed at finding a settlement.

Pakistan's role in the war is crucial. Aside from absorbing the refugees, it has allowed its territory to become the principal funnel for secret aid, money and weapons to the rebels, primarily from the United States but also from China, Egypt and Saudi Arabia.

There is no sign that the government of President Mohammad Zia ul-Haq is wavering from the U.S.- and Pakistan-supported call for a Soviet troop withdrawal and a freely chosen new government for Afghanistan. But, by all accounts, domestic pressure is intensifying for a settlement of the war with less concern for the postwar details.

The stakes are also high for U.S. policy. Growing resentment toward the refugees spills over onto the government and, in turn, toward Washington, since it is widely perceived by Pakistanis that their government's key role in supporting the Afghan resistance is linked to a $4 billion multiyear U.S. economic and military aid program.

Knowledgeable officials say the refugees are not involved in the urban terrorist attacks. The Afghan intelligence agency, known as KHAD, slipped many agents into Pakistan with the refugees to seek recruits, but that effort was not successful, senior Pakistani officials said.

They said Kabul had since changed its strategy and had trained and recruited people to carry out attacks from the tribal areas in northwest Pakistan, a region that is not controlled by the central government and where money traditionally can buy almost anything or any deed.

"Seventy-five percent of the saboteurs that are caught are ours," said a top Pakistani official.

"The tribesmen are good capitalists," he added. "They are not traitors. They just have no concept of patriotism."

The refugees are caught in the middle. Yet the overwhelming majority of them play no role in the two explosive forces that may determine their fate: the emergence of the terrorist bombing campaign and the economic problems caused by unregistered refugees.

"There is tremendous pressure on the province and the people here," said Arbab Jehangir Kahn, Peshawar-based chief minister for North-West Frontier Province, which alone has 2.1 million refugees.

When the refugees came, he said, many were business people and farmers who brought their own transportation, including thousands of buses and trucks, and millions of head of cattle.

"The pressure on our roads, schools, hospitals, grazing grounds is enormous," he said. The refugees raid valuable forest land for wood and "take up the meager job opportunities" in and around Peshawar, he said.

In the vast number of isolated camps such as Tindo, these complaints seem unrelated to the reality of the refugees' empty lives. They say they only want to return home to a sovereign Afghanistan, free of Soviet troops, not make a new life for themselves in Pakistan.

At Tindo camp, the overall impression is one of emptiness and solitude. There are few men present among the 1,400 families and 10,300 people who live among the mud-walled family compounds, and conservative Islamic women withdraw out of sight of male visitors. About 2,500 of the camp's men are in Afghanistan fighting with the resistance, officials said.

The Afghans and Pakistanis "are of one religion, custom and culture," said a camp elder Mohammed Nazir, 52. "And they know we are here of necessity, not choice. "Even if we were given gold every day," he added, "we would not live here."

Dutch Group Aids Transplants

By Ronald van de Krol
Special to the Herald Tribune

LEIDEN, Netherlands — A 13-year-old boy waits in a hospital in Hannover, West Germany, for the telephone call that will signal the start of a long-awaited liver transplant.

In Belgium, a 42-year-old woman travels to a hospital in Brussels for the kidney dialysis treatment that will keep her alive until a suitable donor kidney has been found.

In both cases, the crucial telephone call will come from the Eurotransplant Foundation, a non-profit Dutch foundation that serves as a central clearinghouse for matching transplant candidates and donor organs in five European countries.

The foundation, which is marking its 20th anniversary this year, has helped arrange more than 20,000 kidney transplants alone since 1967.

But as medical technology advances, Eurotransplant is confronting a widening gap between the number of candidates awaiting transplants and the number of available organs.

"The boy in West Germany has been on our urgent list of liver transplants for months," said Maarten Sulzer, a medical student who helps answer telephones to keep Eurotransplant open 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

The needed liver may come from West Germany, or from Austria, Belgium, Luxembourg or the Netherlands, the other countries involved in Eurotransplant.

The foundation, which occupies a corner of Leiden University's teaching hospital, uses its computer data bank to match thousands of patients with available organs.

It also helps charter planes and coordinate medical teams that rush organs to surgeons waiting to perform transplants in participating countries.

Through Eurotransplant, a Luxembourg donor's liver may be implanted in the boy in Hannover, the same donor's kidneys may be used to free the woman in Brussels from dialysis treatment and the heart and cornea may be given to patients elsewhere — all within 24 hours or less.

The foundation recently has decided to invest in a bigger, more advanced computer system, which is necessary, in part, to handle the increased complexity of arranging multi-organ operations, such as heart-and-lung transplants, across national borders.

While the frontiers of medicine are being expanded, however, the number of donor organs is lagging. Dozens of Eurotransplant's patients die each year while awaiting a transplant.

The gap is partially explained by advances in medicine, which are allowing more patients to be added to the list of suitable transplant candidates.

"When kidney transplants were first performed," said Bernadette Kromwijk, secretary of the Eurotransplant board, "they could be done only on a very select group that otherwise enjoyed good health. But nowadays, diabetes sufferers can also receive kidney transplants, and the upper age limit keeps rising."

Of the 8,000 patients awaiting a kidney transplant in Eurotransplant countries, 20 percent are now over the age of 55. In 1982, only 5 percent were in that age group. But only about 2,000 donor kidneys are expected to become available this year, so most patients will wait several years for their transplants.

Another factor in the widening gap is a decline in the number of fatal traffic accidents in Europe. Tougher drunken driving laws, new seat belt regulations and laws requiring motorcyclists to wear helmets have helped curb road deaths.

"It sounds odd, but 60 percent of transplantations are dependent on traffic fatalities," Ms. Kromwijk said. "The majority of donors are healthy, relatively young people who meet with a sudden death, and that usually means a road accident."

The supply of donor organs varies widely from one country to another. The supply is highest in Austria, where 31 donor kidneys became available per million inhabitants in 1986. The lowest number is in the Netherlands, where just under 26 kidneys were donated per million residents.

Ms. Kromwijk said the discrepancy reflected differences in laws on donating organs, not in cultural or religious beliefs. Austria, like France, the Scandinavian countries and, more recently, Belgium, adheres to a "no objection" system, which allows doctors to remove organs from a deceased patient unless the patient had objected before death.

Dutch laws, however, do not provide any explicit legal basis for organ "harvesting," as the removal of organs is described in medical literature.

Doctors may not remove organs for transplantation without the approval of either the deceased, who must have signed a donor card before his death, or of his relatives. The Dutch government has announced plans to draft a new transplant bill, but it is not expected to introduce a "no objection" system, like Austria and Belgium.

Eurotransplant has a staff of 30 and an annual budget of 6 million guilders ($3.3 million), which is raised by charging medical insurance companies and national health plans a fee for every patient registered in its data bank. In the Netherlands, for example, that fee is 6,600 guilders.

Built on two continents — Europe and Asia — and separated by the Bosphorus, Istanbul is a city undergoing rapid change as the business, financial and industrial hub of the country. A look at some of the latest developments and the historical and cultural background of the metropolis.

ISTANBUL in the 1980s is a city in the midst of rapid and ambitious changes. If all goes according to plan, round about the end of the century the city will be not just a bustling Turkish industrial metropolis of 8 million people, but a business and financial center for the Eastern Mediterranean and the Middle East.

To those who know Istanbul only as the former Byzantium and the city of the Ottoman Sultans, its bid to become a major international business center may come as a surprise. In fact the city has been one of the world's key trading outposts ever since Constantine the Great made it his capital in 324 AD. Since the 1950s, it has also been the center of Turkey's rapidly growing industry. "Istanbul is the home of about 40 percent of Turkish industry," says Mr. Nurullah Bezzin, president of the city's Chamber of Industry. "Virtually every sector of modern industry is represented here: textiles, the motor industry, the metal industry, electronics, chemicals and pharmaceuticals."

His colleagues at the city's Chamber of Commerce estimate that the city is also responsible for about 60 percent of Turkish imports, expected to be around $12 billion this year, and about 50 percent of the country's $8.9 billion annual exports.

Importance as a trade center has brought with it a role as a financial one. Since 1980 the number of foreign banks in Turkey has jumped from 4 to 23. All of the new arrivals have their headquarters in Istanbul. Virtually all Turkish banks, other than a few state banks, have their headquarters in Istanbul rather than Ankara, the country's political and administrative capital.

As a result, Istanbul has emerged as the natural home of Turkey's growing capital markets. In December 1985, the Istanbul Stock Market was reopened after being reorganized to cope with the needs of the country in the 1980s. It still has only 45 quoted shares on its prime list — but the volume of activity is growing rapidly.

In addition to this, Istanbul remains the home of Turkey's national press, and the country's cultural capital with its principal museums, libraries, art galleries, and concert orchestras.

The changes in Istanbul are intimately linked with the ambitious economic restructuring plans of the Turkish prime minister, Mr. Turgut Ozal, who has ruled the country since 1983. Mr. Ozal is the moving force behind all the financial and business changes now under way.

Ozal's expected reelection to a second term in the coming general elections on November 29 could mean that Turkey's international trading role will expand even faster between now and 1992 than it has in the last few years.

The business vitality of the 1980s contrasts with a disastrous decade in the 1970s when Istanbul, like the rest of Turkey, seemed unable to come to grips with its problems. The rate of population growth has slackened, but it is still painfully high. From a peak of about 7 percent a year in the 1970s, it is now officially put at 4.2 percent.

Local municipal revenues were wholly inadequate to deal with this challenge and, by the late 1970s, Istanbul was a city out of control. Political stability was restored when the Turkish army took power in a bloodless coup in 1980 and set about reshaping the country's political and economic life.

The people of Turkey's largest city had to wait until 1984 before their city's infrastructure began to improve radically. The turning point was the election in March that year of Mr. Bedrettin Dalan, till then a more or less unknown businessman, as the city's mayor.

The Dalan years have been a unique period of renewal in Istanbul's history this century. Not everyone likes the mayor, but public opinion polls give him a stratospheric 90 percent approval rate.

Mr. Dalan has tackled the chronic infrastructural problems which defeated all his predecessors — and there is every sign that he will have transformed the city by 1990. His achievements range from the creation of the city's first ever sewage treatment and disposal schemes, to the ending of its agonizing water shortage, to the building of new roads and bridges, and a light rail transit system.

By the early part of the next decade Istanbul will be a city with three bridges across the Bosphorus, linking Asia and Europe, as well as a tube tunnel for trains. It will also have nearly a dozen five-star hotels instead of the present three, and about half a dozen conference centers. At the moment, the growing international conference industry has to rely on the facilities of the Hilton and Sheraton Hotels.

Does this mean that it will become an international business center as the Ozal government hopes? Probably, but not certainly. Foreign businessmen in the city still think that its services have some way to go before it can play a much larger international role.

Communications have to be improved. An adequate new school for the foreign community is needed. And bureaucracy will have to be eased still further — car ownership, for example, is still a headache for many foreigners.

Mayor Heads Drive To Reshape City

THREE and a half years as mayor of Turkey's largest city have catapulted Mr. Bedrettin Dalan, 42, to national prominence enjoyed by none of his predecessors. Turks outside Istanbul hope that he will eventually be drawn into national politics.

The people of Istanbul hope that Mr. Dalan will stay put and keep up the good work. So far he shows no signs of wanting to move. He turned down the chance to be a candidate in the coming general elections in Turkey and is certain to run for reelection when municipal elections are held, probably next year.

Mr. Dalan looks to two constituencies. One is the Istanbul private sector, whose views he frequently reflects. He has spoken out against the Fundamentalist wing of the ruling Motherland Party, and wants to turn Istanbul into a modern international business environment able to hold its own with any in the world.

To put the city on the map, he has invited the British universities of Oxford and Cambridge to stage an annual boat race on the Golden Horn. He is building an Olympic village and hopes that it will host the Olympic games either in 2000 or 2004. In 1988 or 1989, Istanbul will play host to the Miss Universe Contest.

But Mr. Dalan's prime constituency is the ordinary people of Istanbul, most of whom are relatively recent arrivals in the city.

He knows how they view Istanbul, because he himself is an immigrant, coming from an Eastern Anatolian family which had settled in the cotton growing Western regions around Izmir where he was born and brought up. He arrived in the city as a university student, and so began a love affair with the metropolis which has dominated his life.

Jak Kamhi, one of Istanbul's top industrialists, compares Mr. Dalan's work with the great nineteenth century redesigner of Paris, Haussmann. There is no doubt that Mr. Dalan will leave Istanbul looking very different from when he took office in 1984.

The Golden Horn and the Bosphorus have been opened up as parkland. In a few years, water and sewage purification will have made the Golden Horn — a noxious waterway in recent years belying its name — once more as blue as the mayor's own eyes.

To push through the changes, Mr. Dalan has had to have endless energy and a very thick skin. He has gone through with demolition work when he deemed it necessary, knowing full well that years of court cases against him would follow afterwards. He has stood under a plane spraying insecticide to demonstrate that it was not dangerous. He is to be seen, with his entourage, at every major function in the city. His personal magic seems to disarm even the most disgruntled Istanbulite.

"You have to make allowances. This man has changed the city and made real differences to the lives of everyone who lives in it," says an observer from an opposition party.

Istanbul, Center of Banking and Finance

AT the end of this year, for the first time ever, Turkey's banks will have to produce independently audited balance sheets. This will not trouble the minority of banks which have been externally audited for the last half decade or more. But for others, as one foreign banker observes, "some of the news may be quite disturbing."

Istanbul is the home of Turkey's banking community, a community which is growing almost daily both as new foreign banks come into the country — there have been 17 new arrivals in the last eight years — and as new Turkish banks are set up.

Until 1980, Turkish banking was a cozy business. Interest rates were well below inflation. Banks relied on fees and commissions to make their profits, and their real trading situation in most cases could only be guessed at because balance sheets were largely cosmetic.

The switch to realistic interest rates in 1980 gave the banks a jolt, one which many of the larger ones still have not adjusted to.

Meanwhile, smaller banks, foreign and local, have found a profitable niche in the market handling trade finance, and recently, merchant bank and specialist services such as leasing.

These include the Turk Ekonomi Bankasi (T.E.B.), which has the proud distinction of being the only Turkish bank without a non-performing loan in its portfolio: the Uluslari Endustri ve Ticaret Bankasi (Interbank), the Iktisat Bankasi (Esbank), and others.

They are being joined by a stream of would-be hopefuls. During the autumn of 1987, no fewer than six new banks were set up in Turkey. This is in line with Treasury policy of keeping the market open to new entrants.

However, some observers have serious doubts about this policy. For a start, the trade finance market has now started to slow down.

The general view among the more established foreign banks is that 1987 will turn out to have been a relatively dull year for business. This means that the new entrants may find the going tougher than they expect.

Most of the new entrants have their eyes on new business, including investment banking. The most ambitious of them is the former general manager of the Yapi ve Kredi Bankasi, Mr. Husnu Ozyegin, who believes that he can build his Yabirimbank, set up in September with a capital of $8.8 million, into a Turkish equivalent of Lazard's.

Bad loans apart, the major banks in Istanbul have another headache these days — how to live in an environment of deposit rate competition where some banks are offering up to 60 percent on one-year money. Deposit rate competition has long been advocated by monetarist radicals in Turkey who see it as a way to bring down interest rates and create stability in the markets.

The fear among conservative bankers is that stability can be achieved only after a period of cut-throat competition, spiraling rates and some crashes, and the Central Bank has so far only introduced it for deposits of one year and more. It fixes other deposit rates, though it allows competition on lending rates.

With several industrial groups and more than one bank known to be finding it hard to stay in business, the feeling is widespread that the coming year could be a bumpy ride for the weaker operators in the market. For the more professional ones, however, profits should be as healthy as ever. An Ozal election victory is expected to release a wave of new business activity.

Exports Expand Despite High Cost of Money

ISTANBUL'S Buyukdere Caddesi is an urban planner's nightmare, a sprawling multilane highway congested at most hours of the day, and overshadowed by a chunk of the city's ringroad, which runs overhead on a concrete platform and blots out the light.

Picturesque it may not be, but Buyukdere Caddesi has emerged as the headquarters of much of Turkish private sector industry. Koc and Sabanci, however, Turkey's two industrial giants, have their headquarters down close to the shores of the Bosphorus at Fındıklı. The split is somewhat symbolic.

Koc's founder, Vehbi Koc, 86, is the undisputed patriarch of Turkish industry. Today his group makes virtually everything imaginable, from automobiles to consumer electronics, from textiles to telephone cables.

Most other industrial groups have made a similar transition. The late Haci Omer Sabanci laid the foundations of the Sabanci Group's prosperity in Adana in the textile industry but the group is now firmly based in Istanbul.

The preeminence of Koc and Sabanci in the Turkish business world is undisputed, and their workforces — around 30,000 — are roughly the same size. Both own banks. Sabanci owns both the Albank, Turkey's most profitable private bank, and a subsidiary joint venture with the Banque Nationale de Paris, BNP-AK. Koc bought a controlling interest in American Express's Turkish operation two years ago, renaming it Koc-American.

Among the next ranking Turkish groups come Cukurova (which like Sabanci has its roots in the cotton-growing south of the country), Yasar (one of the few groups with headquarters outside Istanbul, in Izmir), Anadolu Endustri Holding, Enka, Tekfen and a succession of others.

The turnaround in Turkey's economic policies in the 1980s has meant painful adjustment for all these groups, with the possible exception of Enka, a construction conglomerate which began working outside Turkey in the early 1970s, giving it the edge when policies became more export-oriented a decade later.

The other groups grew up in an environment of heavy tariff protection, strong domestic demand and cheap credit. The domestic demand is still strong and the tariff protection has not yet been lowered as much as many economists would like, but credit for Turkish industry is no longer cheap. The average net cost of borrowing is about 70 to 80 percent, though some of the more fortunate export-oriented firms can get access to investment funds at 26 to 40 percent.

A package of measures announced last spring was intended to prod firms into turning bank debt into equity and curbing corporate tax on a graduated scale if firms sold equity (most are tightly controlled by the families and individuals which founded them).

Export growth comes not from the larger established groups but from a swarm of smaller companies in sectors ranging from textiles to electronics and metal industries, which typically export between 10 and 30 million dollars worth of goods a year.

The number of these is growing steadily. The government would like to channel their exports through trade houses and since 1984 has given special privileges to trading houses which sell more than $50 million a year.

After finance, management is a key problem for many firms, which have grown to a size where they can no longer be run simply as family businesses.

But the number of professional managers is growing steadily. Firms like Ya-sar pride themselves on having developed a tier of effective managers inside the group. "In another generation," says an executive of one Istanbul family holding company, "there will have to be more institutionalization of Turkish firms and family control will become less typical than it is today." One force for change is the new Stock Market in Istanbul.

Though few companies allow more than 20 percent of their shares to be quoted on it, pressure to put more equity on sale is growing steadily.

Restoring the Splendors of Imperial Past

ISTANBUL may have become a major industrial and financial center. Its population may have grown twelve-fold since the establishment of a Republic in Turkey in 1923. Yet it remains an imperial city.

Though no longer a capital, Istanbul is filled with the monuments and places of the Roman, Byzantine and Ottoman Empires. These draw visitors from all over the world and account for the great majority of tourists who visit Turkey.

Balancing the needs of an ancient city against those of a thriving metropolis is no easy task. Almost every building project in Istanbul stumbles upon some Ottoman or Roman remain. House owners on each shore of the Bosphorus can very often point to brickwork in the cellars or garden which goes back to the Byzantines.

Probably the best known conservation work in Istanbul has been carried out by Celik Gulersoy, head of Turkey's Motor and Touring Club. Gulersoy has used a statutory payment to his Club, which all Turkish motorists returning from abroad have to pay, as a fund for restoring and renovating selected Ottoman buildings in the city.

These range from the Art Nouveau palace of the Egyptian Khedives, Hidiy Kası, at Cubuklu on the Anatolian side of the Bosphorus, to the little Ottoman wooden houses around the Byzantine Mosaic museum of Kariye Camii, and the nineteenth century imperial pavilion known as the Malta Kiosk.

Each of these buildings has been rescued from dereliction by Gulersoy and vigorously restored, painted and brought to a state where it can entertain tourists of the motor age. Perhaps his most widely admired restoration is the little hotel between the Blue Mosque and St. Sophia, known as the Green House. Despite relatively high prices, tourists in the know vie with each other for reservations in this recreation of the late nineteenth century world.

The municipality has also launched work for the maintenance and perhaps the partial restoration of the fifth century Walls of Theodosius. The 20-kilometer circuit was intact at the beginning of this century but has now largely been destroyed. Even the famous land walls will probably not survive another generation unless work gets underway urgently.

Elsewhere, work is underway on restoring some of the old Ottoman wooden houses which dominated the city until the last few decades.

Around the sixteenth-century Suleymaniye Mosque, which is one of the most impressive of all Ottoman monuments, work in progress is restoring a 45-hectare site to its traditional appearance. At Zeyrek, around the Panto-crator church, a similar scheme covers 10 hectares.

A special body inside the municipality, known as TASK, is handling the conservation and restoration work. In the longer term the group plans studies to see whether some of the city's best-known monuments (such as the Tekfur-saray or Palace of Constantine Porphyrogenitos) and the Tower and Dungeon of Anemas, which fell into ruin in the last two hundred years, cannot be restored or at least used in some way.

Most interest centers on the future of the area at the front of the peninsula on which Old Istanbul lies.

The Topkapı Palace, home of the Ottoman Sultans for three centuries, and the 1,450-year-old church of St. Sophia stand here. Ayasofya, though dilapidated, still astonishes the visitor with its vast size and its majestic eleventh-century mosaics in the galleries.

Just to the south, near the Blue Mosque (known to Turks as the Sultanahmet), was the Great Palace of the East Roman Emperors. Mosaics from the Palace have recently been restored to their original site here, but there must be many more wonders waiting to be discovered if development in this area is halted and archaeologists are allowed to excavate.

This site was for many centuries the center of the civilized world for Europe and the Middle East. And it is still possible to glimpse its splendor in the sculptures, sarcophagi and statues preserved in the Istanbul Archaeological Museum.

ARTS / LEISURE

A Definitive 'View From the Bridge'

By Sheridan Morley
International Herald Tribune

LONDON — It is hard to believe that there ever has been a better production of Arthur Miller's "A View From the Bridge" than the one that now comes from the National Theatre to the Aldwych Theatre. While his native Broadway, the American theatre helped to shape and dignify after the war, and of which he is unquestionably the greatest living graduate, has turned its commercial back on Miller and is deservedly dying of its own intellectual carelessness, London has always kept him in production — five major premieres and revivals of his work at the National and the Royal Shakespeare alone during the last five years. Now comes the definitive staging by Alan Ayckbourn of a 30-year-old play that has not in the past been without its problems.

Under the huge and dominant skyline of the Brooklyn Bridge, we are introduced to an immigrant domestic tragedy framed within the guidelines of classical Greek drama. Eddie Carbone, played by Michael Gambon in what has to be the performance of the year, is the self-destructive yet ever-bullish longshoreman unknowingly in love with his own niece. When that love is first revealed and then threatened by the arrival of a Sicilian "submarine" who has to be kept in hiding while he attempts an illegal living on the docks, Eddie betrays him to the authorities and brings down on himself the full devastation of a moral code he has never totally accepted or even understood.

Miller's play, which started out as a one-act drama and remains among his tightest scripts, is about the clashes between morality and law, between romance and incest, between a code of honor and a way of life, but in the end it is always and only about Eddie. "I mourn him," as his lawyer and the play's narrator says, "with a certain alarm because he allowed himself to be wholly known." And that is the final test of Gambon's mythic and epic performance. Across two hours we do indeed get wholly to know Eddie in a way that we have seldom wholly known. Willy Loman or John Proctor, the other two tragic heroes of Miller's best work.

A paunchy, powerful obsessive who lets you smell the sweat of his ships, as good a man as he had to be but finally brought down by a self-destructive passion that is animal in its savagery, Eddie goes out like a maimed lion, leaving only the wreckage of a family and a waterfront community. He could live with everything from the depression to the immigration authorities but not with his own incestuous desires.

And for the rest of Ayckbourn's British cast, brought up far from the shadows of Brooklyn Bridge and unacquainted with the code of immigrant conduct or the conscience of a nation in transition, one that Miller alone has always best expressed, this is no less of an achievement. Elizabeth Bell as Eddie's down-trodden wife, Suzan Sylvester as their unlucky niece, Adrian Rawlins as the Sicilian stud, Michael Simkins as his avenging brother and James Hayes as the rueful narrator all give performances which are the distinction and the highlight of this London winter.

To the Mermaid from Stratford's Swan comes Jeremy Irons in a rare and masterful revival of "The Rover" by Aphra Behn, who was Britain's first notable female dramatist.

What we have here is a Restoration romp from 1677 concerning a group of cavaliers who, exiled to a Spanish colony during Cromwell's Parliament, start a series of romantic liaisons with three sisters determined to make the most of Carnival.

The play leaves a lot to be desired, and is inclined to fall apart somewhat too rapidly after the interval. By heavily doctoring its text and adding sizable chunks from its original source (Thomas Killigrew's "The Wanderer"), John Barton has come up with a kind of Pilgrim's Progress through foreign romantic disasters, one which allows Irons to define himself as a comical Douglas Fairbanks, admittedly with a voice that veers from Michael Crawford to Ralph Richardson in moments of crisis, rather than the poetic dreamer we have come to expect of him.

There are still one or two laughs in "The Importance of Being Earnest," at the Whitehall, though admittedly not many by the time

Hunge and Bracket have finished with it. A double drag act from radio and the concert circuit, Dame Hilda and Doctor Evadne differ from the redoubtable Wizardess of Oz. Dame Edna Evergreen, in that they lack her jocular savagery and manic jokiness, while declining even in the program notes to acknowledge their masculine identities as Patrick Fyffe and George Logan.

Trading in a ghastly kind of twee coyness, they seem like certain ventriloquists to have mysteriously found their true home on radio where something in their voices manages to conjure up a whole lost empire of cascading gentility. On stage they are inclined to freeze into their vast tea-cozy costumes, and in turning to Oscar Wilde for a few gags they have come badly un-planned.

The idea that Dame Hilda might make a strong Lady Bracknell is not in itself impossible. But having got that far, Hunge and Bracket and their director Lou Stein have decided that the play (given a straightforward revival by another company at the Royal only last month) could not be left to speak for itself.

Accordingly we get frequent asides by Dame Hilda, welcoming us to her living room for the tea-time performance and then frequently commenting on the inadequacy of Dr. Evadne in her portrayal of Miss Prism. Worse than that, we also get a creaking subplot of their own devising whereby the friends supposed to be playing Cecily and Gwendolen have been delayed by (guess what) a missing handbag at Victoria Station, whereby requiring the two stars to play those roles as well as their minor players are drafted from their audience and garden.

Hunge and Bracket in a scene from the drag "Importance of Being Earnest."

Filming the Story of Hanna, a Hungarian Heroine

By Thomas Quinn Curtiss
International Herald Tribune

BUDAPEST — The story of Hanna Senesh, a Hungarian heroine of the World War II struggle against fascism on the eve of the arrival of Soviet troops, is being spread. Shooting for a movie about her has been completed in Hungary and the crew has moved to Israel for additional filming. Her diary and two accounts of her martyrdom — "A Great Wind Cometh" by Yael Palgi and "The Summer That Bleed" by Anthony Masters — have been published.

She was born in Budapest in 1921, the daughter of a popular comedy writer, and first encountered anti-Semitism backstage at one of her father's rehearsals when she heard two stagehands cursing Jews. A budding poet, she hoped to become a dramatist, but in 1937 the Nazi racial decrees were partially adopted by the Hungarian government and she was deprived of holding class office in her school. This converted her to Zionism and she emigrated to Palestine and joined a kibbutz.

As the Nazis seized control of Hungary and began deporting Jews to death camps, a British unit stationed in Palestine was preparing to attempt to rescue captured pilots by parachuting into occupied countries of Eastern Europe. Senesh volunteered and after rigorous training was parachuted to the Hungarian border. Crossing it with two accomplices, equipped with a radio, she was captured and taken to Budapest on espionage charges.

A security officer interrogated her under torture. She did not divulge her purpose, but her real name was discovered and her mother, who had remained in Hungary, was brought to share her cell in hopes that this would lead to a confession. She went on trial, but with the Red Army nearing Budapest the judges deserted. Though she had not been convicted, the prosecutor ordered her executed and she died before a firing squad.

This is the subject of "Hanna's War," which is being filmed in English by the Cannon company. Menahem Golan, the chairman of Cannon, is directing. After shooting on Lake Balaton in summer, the crew shot scenes in Budapest studios and streets. This month they are in Israel for the story's happy ending and its epilogue. Golan, known chiefly for his producing endeavors, studied under Michael Saint-Denis at the Old Vic of London and subsequently staged plays for the Habimah theater in Tel Aviv, including adaptations of such American classics as "Tobacco Road" and "A Streetcar Maruschka Detmers as Hanna Senesh.

Named Desire." "The Magician of Lublin," "The Delta Force" and "Over the Top" are among his ventures in cinematic direction.

After a long search for an actress for Hanna, he picked the Franco-Dutch starlet Maruschka Detmers. Detmers made her debut in Jean-Luc Godard's "Prenom: Carmen" and has been seen in a remake of "Devil in the Flesh."

Her histrionic schooling has been scant, but she is deeply dedicated to her current assignment. She prepared her emotional scenes, some outbreaks of high hysteria, others of required icy control, in solitary contemplation in her dressing room. The fruit of these efforts was apparent recently when she appeared in a sequence in which she stands trial and is permitted to make a statement. As she outlines the principles that have guided her, she succeeds in conveying the nobility and beauty that suffering confers.

Ellen Burstyn, the recipient of Oscars and Tonys, plays Hanna's bewildered mother, mystified by her daughter's fiery spirit of revolt. Donald Pleasence has been entrusted with the part of the interrogator. "I have acted some decent people during my long career, but in films I am frequently called upon to be repulsive, to be an insane scientist intent on blowing up the planet, or the weird inhabitant of a haunted house, or a specter or a spook suspected of having murdered his whole family. Yet the role I relish most is that of John Tarleton, the successful underwear merchant of Bernard Shaw's 'Misalliance.'"

David Warner is similarly assigned to be a "heavy" again; this time he is the relentless prosecutor who sends Hanna to her death. Anthony Andrews is the squadron leader training troops in Palestine and Denholm Elliott, an ever-satisfying British actor, plays the head of the Jewish Advisory Board who is negotiating with Adolf Eichmann, then stationed in Hungary, seeking to obtain Hanna's pardon. Golan intends to give the film its premiere at the 1988 Cannes festival.

War Dominates Book Prizes

WASHINGTON — Memories of two wars dominated this year's National Book Awards, as honors were bestowed Monday night upon a novel of a Vietnam veteran's haunted dreams and a chronicle of the development of the atomic bomb.

The prize for the best fiction for 1987 went to Larry Heinemann for his second novel, "Paco's Story" (Farrar Straus & Giroux), which traces one soldier's experiences as the sole survivor of a massacre during the Vietnam War. The winner of the nonfiction award was Richard Rhodes for "The Making of the Atomic Bomb," published by Simon & Schuster. The selection of Heinemann's novel — described as "agonizing" and "down to the wire" by the chairwoman of the fiction jury was unexpected given the competition, which included Philip Roth's latest novel, "The Counterlife," and Toni Morrison's current best seller, "Beloved." The $10,000 awards were presented in New York.

MARKETS: New York Rallies, Then Falters

Volume on the New York Stock Exchange was higher, with about 184.3 million shares traded, compared with 160.7 million on Monday.

Prices were lower in active trading of American Stock Exchange issues.

Robert Hatcher, a Barclays Bank PLC vice president in corporate foreign exchange, said foreign exchange traders believed that Mr. Reagan's remark was made solely to pacify the stock market.

"Most of the people in the market feel that the only reason Reagan made those comments is that the stock market has been losing ground," Mr. Hatcher said.

"The dollar had a huge rally after that" comment by Mr. Reagan, said Philip Roth, first vice president and market analyst at E.F. Hutton & Co.

"All of the markets had to react to it," Mr. Roth said. "But the impact of that is now over, and the market has returned to its drifting and uncertain period."

Despite the brief rebound, other analysts remained convinced that new lows would be tested.

"It looks like we're in for another shakeout," said Hildegard Zagorski of Prudential-Bach-

Securities Inc. "The foreign markets led the way, the dollar hit a new low—it's a continuing saga. The market is in a very defensive posture."

She said there was fear in the market that it might test the lows of Oct. 19, the day the Dow industrial average plunged 508 points.

Adding to the woes on Wall Street was a decision Tuesday by hundreds of NYSE clerks to strike. Market officials said the exchange, which has been struggling since its 506-point dive, would not be disrupted.

The union, which is seeking more favorable pension terms, represents about 1,400 clerks, secretaries and other support personnel at the exchange, and its subsidiary, the New York Futures Exchange, and at Securities Industry Automation Corp.

The most actively traded NYSE stocks were components of the Dow average. General Electric topped the actives list with a loss of 7/8 to 43 3/4.

Some of the biggest individual losses in the market were in takeover stocks. Southland Corp. was the catalyst for the selling in that group, traders said. Its stock, halted Tuesday on the NYSE for an imbalance of trades and never reopened, fell 16 1/2 to 51 in over-the-counter trading, according to Jefferies & Co., which often makes markets in NYSE issues.

Southland said its underwriters would not proceed now with the pricing and sale of $1.5 billion of debt, which was to be used to finance an acquisition of Southland by the company's founding family. (A.P. UPI, Reuters)

General Cinema Buys More Cadbury

LONDON — General Cinema Corp. has increased its stake in Cadbury Schweppes PLC to about 18.5 percent, Cadbury Schweppes confirmed on Tuesday.

Dealers said General Cinema, based in New York, purchased the shares through the brokerage firm Cazenove & Co.

At the time, General Cinema said it had acquired its 8.3 percent stake in Cadbury for about $136.5 million in open-market purchases on the London Stock Exchange.

Philips, China Form Venture

AMSTERDAM — Philips NV, the electronics group, said Tuesday that it had signed an agreement with China on technology transfer and the setting up of manufacturing joint ventures.

will be provided by Philips in the form of equipment and expertise. Production is to start in 1990.

The company will help China in developing banking systems and business communication switches, Philips said.

China National has a 45 percent stake, Philips 30 percent and Novel 25 percent in the venture, Philips said.

BMW Reports Rise in Revenue For 10 Months

MUNICH — Bayerische Motoren Werke AG said Tuesday that parent company revenue for the first 10 months of the year rose 18 percent to 14.4 billion Deutsche marks ($8.7 billion at current rates) from 12.2 billion DM a year earlier.

Eberhard von Kuenheim, the managing board chairman, said there had been no drop in demand for BMW cars despite the fall of the dollar and predicted that 1987 would be a good year, with parent company revenue rising more than 10 percent from last year's 14.9 billion DM.

Mr. Kuenheim said, however, that if the dollar continued to fall, it would affect West Germany's car industry, including BMW, in the long term.

Mr. Kuenheim said sales in the United States were expected to fall to 92,000 units this year from 97,000 in 1986.

BMW increased production to 376,273 cars in the first 10 months of the year, compared with 370,621 in the same 1986 period. Car sales increased to 371,856 from 369,671.

AUTOMAKERS: Dollar's Fall Gives U.S. Big Reason for Optimism

For Robert S. Miller, a vice chairman of Chrysler Corp., the dollar's new level represents the righting of a previous wrong.

increase, while the domestic industry's fell by 16.5 percent.

Because of the continuing trade deficit with Japan, U.S. auto executives do not think that the value of the yen against the dollar will decline, and some expect it to climb even more.

Price increases also appear to be taking their toll on European car sales in the United States.

Honda Motor Co. already has announced that it will build a second U.S. assembly plant and work toward becoming a free-standing automaker in the United States.

The weakened dollar is also giving U.S. automotive suppliers a better chance to do business with the Japanese companies operating in the United States.

Mr. Myers of TRW thinks there is little doubt that over time the weakened dollar will lead to more production in U.S. factories.

"After that, we do what we have to do," said Mr. Miller of Chrysler. Mr. Myers of TRW thinks there is little doubt that over time the weakened dollar will lead to more production in U.S. factories.

"We've got a trend here that's been under way for some time," he said. "It portends well for manufacturing in North America."

Japan's Car Makers Decry U.S. Quota

TOKYO — American and Japanese automobile makers may be on a collision course over Japan's export quota to the United States.

While some U.S. makers want the current annual quota of 2.3 million cars reduced, Japanese makers believe the whole quota system is outdated and irrelevant.

1987, against its peak of 1.96 million in 1985.

Hiroshi Ono, manager of Nissan Motor Co.'s business research department, said, "There are opinions in the U.S. that deepening protectionism may hurt consumers, as it leads to less competition and more scope for price rises."

Japanese analysts said the other issue behind the opposition is that U.S. car makers never used the quota for its original purpose of giving them a window of opportunity to develop their own efficient small-car production facilities.

They said the quota agreement was meant to give U.S. automakers time to develop small car production, as they had lagged in trying to cope with the major shift of consumer demand to such cars.

But during the initial years of the quota a high profit market for full and intermediate cars was revitalized.

The economists said U.S. car makers thus decided to avoid the high development costs of small-car production by establishing business ties with makers in Japan instead, importing from overseas and setting up joint ventures with overseas firms.

Low Prices Halt or Hurt 5 Firms' Share Issues

Five big concerns in Europe and Asia said Tuesday that the collapse of stock prices had delayed or damaged their efforts to raise capital in the markets.

response from investors and that Mr. Li's group would have to take up much of the issue.

Norsk Hydro's rights issue had been authorized by shareholders and Norway's parliament only last week. The company had intended to use proceeds to finance investments in the oil and gas sector, to build a magnesium plant in Canada, and for its fertilizer operations.

Gruppo Ferruzzi, Montedison's main shareholder, to postpone the operation. Montedison did not say when the issue would take place.

Several U.S. companies had already announced in recent days the abandonment of mergers or stock issues as a result of the turmoil in world markets since Oct. 19.

In announcing the postponement, Norsk Hydro's board cited the "recent sharp drop in prices on stock exchanges."

In Hong Kong, underwriters said small investors had shunned four rights issues for the Cheung Kong (Holdings) Ltd. group, as share prices have plunged 30 percent below subscription levels. Subscriptions closed Tuesday.

Donald E. Petersen, chairman of Ford Motor Co., said last month that the ceiling should be cut by 600,000 cars. But exports in the current fiscal year ending in March will already fall well below the existing quota, Japanese sources said.

The newly affected companies are Norsk Hydro A/S, the Norwegian state-controlled energy, fertilizer and metals concern, which said it was delaying indefinitely a rights issue of 3 billion kroner ($473 million); Montedison SpA, the Italian chemicals concern, which put off a 1 trillion lire ($820 million) rights issue, and Brown Boveri AG, the engineering group, which said it would probably postpone a 400 million Swiss franc ($293 million) issue that was to help finance a merger with ASEA AB.

Tim Youngman, an analyst of Nordic markets with EB Savory Millin in London, said: "This is certainly a symptom of what is happening to anyone trying to raise equity in Europe."

Brokers said underwriters or their subunderwriters could lose up to 1.4 billion Hong Kong dollars. The new shares are worth 7.2 billion as of Tuesday's close.

Mr. Petersen said his figure was justified by the annual capacity of 1.2 million cars that 11 Japanese makers are expected to reach in their U.S. plants next year.

Others affected were Yves Saint Laurent, the fashion and cosmetics concern, which put off a 600 million French franc ($106 million) share offer that had been set for Dec. 4; and four Hong Kong-based companies controlled by the property magnate Li Ka-shing. Brokers said that their rights issue of 10 billion Hong Kong dollar ($128 million) had drawn a lukewarm

Brown Boveri and ASEA said their merger, scheduled for Jan. 4, would go ahead, and the Swiss concern said it was considering a loan from the merged company or from banks to finance its part.

Li Ka-shing, chairman of Cheung Kong, and companies in the group would subscribe for and underwrite a total of more than 50 percent of the issues. The other Li companies involved are Hutchison Whampoa Ltd., Cavendish International Holdings Ltd. and Hongkong Electric Holdings Ltd.

U.S. sales of Japanese-made cars in fiscal 1988 could be about 8 percent below the quota if trends continue, an official at the Ministry of International Trade and Industry said.

Spanish nights are always an entertaining follow-up to the days.

Flamenco. Yet another temptation to postpone going home to bed.

While other countries sleep, this is what we delight in.

Unlike elsewhere, in Spain nights are not meant for sleeping. Or rather, not just for sleeping. Here you'll find you are constantly tempted to put off going to bed. Night after night. After a delicious dinner there are lots of possibilities. You choose: have a drink in a lively pub, go to a nightclub with live music, try your luck in a sophisticated Casino or dance the night away in some village square at festival time.

How can you resist these temptations? Your bed can wait. Besides, that's why the siesta was invented.

DOLLAR: Reagan Spurs Rebound

pushes it up to a better level to sell."

Market participants have been pessimistic about the negotiations between the White House and Congress on how to cut the massive federal budget deficit.

Several factors have contributed to the dollar's sharp falls of the past few days.

One is a belief among traders that the Group of Seven industrial democracies will not try to stop a further decline because of the huge U.S. merchandise trade deficits with Japan and West Germany.

The dollar's fall of more than 40 percent since early 1985 has been engineered by the Reagan administration to cut the trade gap.

So far, monthly U.S. trade figures show no real shrinkage of the deficit, which was $15.68 billion in August. The U.S. trade figures for September are to be released on Thursday.

Another cause of pressure on the dollar has been moves by the Federal Reserve Board to drive interest rates down to support the sagging stock market.

Selling intensified after Treasury Secretary James A. Baker 3d said last week that interest rates would be kept low to head off a recession.

Mr. Baker declined to comment on the dollar when he arrived Tuesday for the latest round of budget talks with congressional leaders.

If the administration wants the dollar to stop falling, it will face a difficult task unless it can agree with Congress on sizeable cuts in the budget deficit, foreign exchange dealers and economists said.

The markets are increasingly cynical about the ability of the budget negotiators to cut the deficit by more than the $23 billion required by law for the 1988 financial year, ending next Sept. 30.

Because the deficit is projected to grow to about $180 billion in 1988 from $148 billion in 1987, a reduction of $23 billion would be perceived in the markets as inadequate, dealers say.

If deeper cuts are not made, the foreign investors who are financing the U.S. budget deficit by buying government bonds will demand either higher interest rates or the chance to buy dollars more cheaply, they said.

"This is becoming a joke. The perception in the markets is that these guys are not in control," said Douglas Madison, a trader at Bank of America in New York.

Steve Cerier, foreign exchange economist at Manufacturers Hanover Trust in New York, agreed, saying: "I don't think anybody knows what to do. They're procrastinating, and now things are slipping out of their control."

PARIS — Gloom over the dollar's direction and the world's economic health sent major stock markets lower on Tuesday, but London bucked the trend to move slightly higher.

Prices in London began to fall back in late trading as the New York Stock Exchange opened lower, but dealers said bargain-hunting had prompted a small advance for the day.

"The market's showing a sort of false calm at the moment," one dealer said. "But it's slightly encouraging that New York's lower opening hasn't affected us too badly."

The Financial Times-Stock Exchange index, the London market's leading indicator, rose 8.20 points, or 0.5 percent, to close at 1,733.50. The index was down more than 50 points just after the opening.

Dealers said some selective buying had emerged, especially among the blue-chip stocks, with some operators deciding that the moment had arrived to pick up bargains.

They added, however, that sentiment remained negative and that many traders were skeptical that U.S. authorities would reach agreement on reducing the federal budget deficit.

Under U.S. legislation, about $23 billion must be cut from the budget deficit by Nov. 20, although few analysts believe that that will be enough to restore confidence in the dollar. Many analysts in London have said that a reduction of at least $60 billion over two years is needed to calm the markets.

U.S. trade data to be released on Thursday is also adding to market jitters, they said. A September merchandise trade deficit above expectations would almost certainly throw shares into renewed turmoil, they said. A deficit of about $15 billion has been widely predicted after a $15.68 billion deficit in August.

FRANKFURT: Share prices ended sharply lower but above the worst levels of the session. Dealers said investors were concerned about the outlook for the dollar and the direction of world stock markets.

The Commerzbank 60-share index, which is calculated at mid-session, plunged 96.30 points, or 7.31 percent, to 1,220.90. The drop was larger than the 7.1 percent slump on Oct. 19 and just short of the 7.4

percent slide on May 29, 1982, during the Cuban missile crisis.

Trading on all eight West German bourses was extended by half an hour Tuesday after a failure in the computer quoting system in Frankfurt at the start of official business.

PARIS: Share prices were sharply lower in very quiet trading. Many operators were sidelined before Wednesday's Armistice Day holiday and the announcement of U.S. trade figures on Thursday, dealers said. The Paris Bourse indicator was off 6.27 percent.

Trading was interrupted in the afternoon when a bomb threat was received and the bourse evacuated.

TOKYO: The Nikkei average of 225 leading shares had its fifth largest single-day loss, dropping 731.91 yen, or 3.26 percent, to close at 21,686.46 yen. The Nikkei average, which lost 218.64 yen Monday, is now where it was at the end of March.

The drop occurred as the Japanese government began a three-day public offering of shares in the telecommunications giant Nippon

Telegraph & Telephone Corp. in a second stage of privatization.

The offer price was set at 2 million yen ($19,000) a share as the company's stock closed unchanged at 2.64 million yen a share.

HONG KONG: The Hang Seng index fell 96.07 points, or about 4 percent, to close at 2,043.24. Dealers said they were surprised by a magnitude of the fall. On Monday the Hang Seng index had ended at 2,149.41 points higher.

SYDNEY: The Australian stock market plunged to a 14-month low Tuesday as investors fell into line with trends in London and New York. The All Ordinaries index closed 48.6 points lower, or 3.9 percent, at 1,203.4, reversing a rally Monday, when it rose 13.9 points in bargain-hunting.

The Australian market has fallen 47.8 percent in value since the All Ordinaries index peaked at 2,306 on Sept. 21.

Prices also fell in New Zealand, Singapore, Malaysia and the Philippines. (A.P. Reuters)

Regan: Market Will Peg Dollar, Not the Banks

WASHINGTON — Donald T. Regan, the former U.S. secretary of the Treasury, said Tuesday that central banks and finance ministers had to let the dollar fall because they found they could not "rig the market."

"When I first went into Wall Street years ago I learned something: That is, don't fight the tape," Mr. Regan said.

When the leading industrial nations agreed in February in Paris to set exchange rate parameters for the dollar, he said, "it turned out that what they were trying to do the market didn't like" and, as a result, "we started on a course that could lead us toward a recession."

Mr. Regan was head of Merrill Lynch & Co. before joining the Reagan administration. In February he resigned as White House chief of staff.

EMS Realignment Not in Store, Official Says

Compiled by Our Staff From Dispatches

BASEL, Switzerland — European Community central bankers see no need for an immediate realignment of the currencies governed by the European Monetary System despite the disruptive effect of the falling dollar, a central bank source said here on Tuesday.

The European source, speaking at the end of a meeting of central bank governors from Europe, Japan and the United States, said a realignment of EMS parities was "totally excluded."

The governor of the Belgian central bank, Jean Godeaux, said the issue was not discussed at a two-day meeting of the Bank for International Settlements, which ended Tuesday. Mr. Godeaux is the current president of the BIS, which is often called the central banks' own central bank.

Mr. Godeaux said the 12 European Community central bank governors formally ratified an agreement reached at a meeting in Denmark in September. The accord calls for strengthened monetary cooperation in Europe and gives central banks greater possibilities to intervene to defend EMS parities.

The EMS, which links eight European currencies, came under pressure last week after the sharp fall of the dollar against the Deutsche mark and other major currencies. At one point, the mark rose to a record high of nearly 3.41 French francs in Paris.

A falling dollar generally causes havoc in the EMS, which establishes target ranges within which eight of the 12 EC currencies can fluctuate against each other. Strong currencies, such as the West German mark and Dutch guilder, gain more than weak ones, such as the Italian lira and French franc, threatening to take them outside these ranges.

Under EMS rules, the currencies of West Germany, France, Belgium, Ireland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands and Denmark are allowed to fluctuate by a maximum of 2.25 percent around an agreed central rate. The Italian lira is granted a wider margin.

France and West Germany last week announced coordinated interest rate moves to help ease the mounting pressure on the system. Under the accord, France raised the interest rate at which it furnishes liquidity to the banking system while West Germany lowered a similar rate.

The accord, by narrowing relative interest rates between the two countries, has at least temporarily eased pressure on the EMS by making the French franc more attractive against the strong West German currency.

But experts in Brussels continue to believe that realignment may be needed, and an influential West German financial newsletter said on Monday that the West German Bundesbank president, Karl Otto Pöhl, wanted an early reevaluation of the mark within the EMS.

Mr. Pöhl refused to comment as he left Tuesday's meeting.

Jacques Delors, president of the European Commission, the EC's executive body, told reporters after the meeting that he was satisfied with current parities within the EMS.

"I was struck by the determination of the EC governors to support the EMS," Mr. Delors said. "It was a good meeting to reinforce the EMS. It brought a bit of sunshine into a gray day."

Mr. Delors also rejected suggestions that the statement released by governors after Monday's meeting here had been imprecise and had given foreign exchange dealers little reason to reverse their negative view of the dollar.

"Once foreign exchange dealers read the statement, they understood it," he said. (Reuters, A.P.P.)

NFL: A Baffling First Half

By Michael Wilbon

Washington Post Service

WASHINGTON — As the National Football League enters the second half of a bizarre season, fewer and fewer things make sense. The San Diego Chargers have the best record in the American Conference, the Raiders are in the midst of the franchise's longest losing streak (five) in 23 years, the Chicago Bears can't stop anybody in the first three quarters and for the first time in six seasons there doesn't appear to be a Super Bowl favorite.

There may even be a resumption of negotiations between the players union and the owners' management council. The union filed an anti-trust suit last month against the league, ending a 24-day strike without a new collective bargaining agreement.

But Commissioner Pete Rozelle has urged the two sides to resume negotiations, and next week's pension board meeting could give rise to new talks.

The management council and union both will have representatives in Key Biscayne, Florida, for the retirement board meetings next week, at which time Jack Donlan, the owners' chief negotiator, and union chief Gene Upshaw could approach each other about reopening negotiations.

Donlan and Upshaw could not be reached for comment, but Rozelle has said both sides might find a better atmosphere for negotiating if they can do it in relative peace, while on-field doctors receive most of the media scrutiny.

In most of the NFL cities, interest remains high because 22 of the 28 teams are vying in contention for playoff berths.

And a 23rd team — the defending champion New York Giants (2-6) — is capable of winning its remaining games and making it as a wild-card entry.

The Giants entered the season as the favorite to win a second straight league championship, but eight weeks of play — three of them with replacement players — have seemingly left the league without a favorite. In the recent past, the Redskins (1982), Raiders (1983), 49ers (1984), Bears (1985) and Giants (1986) had established themselves as the team to beat by the midpoint of the season.

Which then, with seven games left in the regular season, is the best ... And for the first time in six seasons there doesn't appear to be a Super Bowl favorite.

When the strike ended, it seemed to be the Bears, and a dramatic victory over Tampa Bay the first week back from the walkout supported that theory. But since then, the Bears have had to come from behind in the closing minutes to beat Kansas City (1-7) and Green Bay (3-4), and now look as vulnerable as anyone with linebacker Otis Wilson and defensive lineman Dan Hampton out for several weeks with knee injuries.

"We've probably used up our allotment of miracles," said coach Jack Donlan.

Counting only games with union players, Washington would be a game behind Philadelphia in the National Conference East. Similarly, the Vikings (4-1 with regulars) would trail Chicago by only a game in the NFC Central. With all games counting, however, the Eagles, Saints and Vikings look like the strongest wild-card contenders, although the Cowboys, Cardinals, Giants and Buccaneers are alive.

New Orleans, which visits NFC West-leading San Francisco this weekend, might be looking at something better than a wild-card spot.

Only two AFC teams (the Bengals and Chiefs) are virtually eliminated, leaving too many playoff possibilities to consider. One has only to look at the conference's Eastern division, all five of whose teams are 4-4 on the year.

Back then, we argued about who was a better hitter, Ted Williams or Mickey Mantle. Now it seems kids are more issue-oriented, more into personalities.

Take these two I heard going at it the other day on a street corner. They were busting each other's chops about their respective sport heroes — Irving Fryar, the football player, and Mitch (Blood) Green, the former heavyweight contender.

"That's the first fight he ever won?" "C'mon, Mitch took Tyson 10 rounds in '86 and he only lost because the promoter shortchanged him. He said he woulda won, but, and I quote, 'I couldn't get motivated because of the money thing.' I used the same line on my old man when he refused to donate the cops allowance, then asked me why I didn't do the lawn."

"The gas station caper is impressive, I admit. Greatness, however, is measured on longevity and versatility. What about Fryar's alleged gambling on NFL games? What about the drug rumors?"

"Never proven. Same with the assault, vandalism and trespassing rap back in college. This guy can't do anything wrong right. He's a shaver of his own hair, a TV on his dashboard. The cops stop him. They find pills and angel dust in the car. Top that."

"O.K., Fryar gets injured in a game, leaves the stadium at half-time, goes for a cruise, and he's talking on his car phone when he runs into a tree. Totals his Benz. Gets himself a concussion."

"I've done worse on my skateboard. Look, I thought you'd be reasonable, but I can see I have to go to the well for my A stuff. When my man Mitch gets busted on the TV and angel dust charge, the cops check and find out his driver's license has been suspended 54 times."

LONDON — Wednesday is Armistice Day, and let's hope it stays that way on the Belgrade sporting front.

Yugoslavia's splendid Marakana Stadium will be a theatre of volatile passions aroused by winner-take-all soccer. Center-stage will be the year's most intriguing, international match: Yugoslavian deficiency of touch and technique vs. English strength and solidity.

In evidence have been portents of unwanted violence. This on-edge match arrives just as Slavic supporters have unleashed a noxious brand of hooliganism laced with tear gas.

Emotions will be heightened because Yugoslavia or England, but not both, can qualify for the 1988 European Championship.

First and foremost, it is up to the players to demonstrate control. Yugoslavs, the cleverer artifice, would be foolish indeed if they carry out threats of coarse retribution after their 2-0 defeat in London last year.

Belgrade will ring to the sound of those boating for the physical courage often lacking in Slavic play. Far from obeying such impulses, the really brave will Wednesday will use skill to outwit the opposition; the real forte will be self-control.

"It will be white-hot, a sizzler," purrs England's manager, Bobby Robson. He had previously predicted a tense cat-and-mouse struggle, so he's confused. Imagine the minds of players sent out over the parapet.

Waiting in Belgrade, at an army barracks commanded by his troops, is a calm, but still uncertain Yugoslav manager. "I have the players to beat England," Ivica Osim has said. "I have the tactics to beat England. But I cannot be sure I have the time to get the act together."

For once the boot is on the other foot. English clubs released their stars a week before the contest, while Osim had to sweat over players performing for Italian, Spanish, Austrian and French clubs last weekend.

Do you hear Robson chucking? Hell no — he gets far too tense this close to action. Besides, his own words may ring in his ears. A year ago he declared, "My gut feeling is that if we had longer to prepare, results would be 20 percent better." Gut-check time.

He's seen Yugoslavs until his eyeballs popped, seen marvelous technique even in defenders. He knows in his heart that only Clean Hoddle and John Barnes have comparable smoothness.

The culture is inbred in the Yugoslav, even from furthest defender back. On the present team, Marko Elsner, son of the Austrian team manager, who will be sweeping up and taking care of Gary Lineker, who these days is dropped by Barcelona but has scored four times in England's last two internationals.

Robson is experienced enough (58 internationals; 31 victories; 14 draws, 13 defeats; 108 goals for, 34 against) to mask some trepidation. But a week is time on his mind, time when fear seeps in.

His message come Wednesday will be up and at 'em, firm but fair (and, should no one be listening, if necessary unfair). Knock the class Slavs off their game. Deny them rhythm. Strangle their confidence. Quiet the crowd and force impatient self-destruction.

On Armistice Day, a Battle Shapes Up in Belgrade

His message come Wednesday will be up and at 'em, firm but fair (and, should no one be listening, if necessary unfair). Knock the class Slavs off their game. Deny them rhythm. Strangle their confidence. Quiet the crowd and force impatient self-destruction.

With his squad rested and fit, Robson keeps his selection secret. He has us guessing on whether he will choose the inventive, enigmatic Hoddle or the younger, more mobile Neil Webb, who shone in England's 8-0 thrashing of the clueless Turks.

He might pick neither. Everton's Peter Reid is a warrior to take a game by the scruff of the neck. He does it with the abrasive edge Yugoslavs dislike, but with just enough wit, and just enough legality, to stay friendly with referees.

To dominate, you have to win the ball, so I would start Reid and when his energy flags bring on Hoddle. But would, by then, Yugoslavia's sting be drawn? Would Terry Butcher and Bryan Robson, two of England's stalwarts, still be in the field?

Butcher is under police prosecution for violence in a Glasgow club game, and Bryan Robson, the captain, also went berserk recently. Yet both are selected, making a sham of the FA council policy. They will be soundly leop-tured by the chairman and team manager before the match.

At center-back Butcher partners young Tony Adams, whose inexperience was utterly exposed recently in West Germany by Rudi Voller.

So a constrained fighter has to bolster a novice at the heart of a defense lacking speed and guile against forwards like Fodji Fodji and Zlatko Vujovic who strike, on their day, like piranhas.

Vujovic, the Bordeaux opportunist, hungers to make amends for three misses that would have wiped out England's 2-0 victory at Wembley. His cutting edge is incisive again, as he showed for Bordeaux in the French First Division on Saturday.

The Vujovic twins (brother Zoran is a supercharged fullback with Bordeaux) are first in Yugoslavia's team sheet, the "psychological fighters" Osim seeks.

Others are temperamentally suspect. In midfield, Dragan Stojkovic, Milan Jankovic and Blaz Sleser are capable of bemusing England. Yet Jankovic was sent off for swearing during Real Madrid's astonishing 4-0 home defeat to Atletico Madrid on Saturday.

And Stojkovic, 22, from Red Star Belgrade, admits he loses his rhythm and temper when opponents needle him. England will.

Osim remembers. Fluidity itself in his own time (they called him Strasser), Osim in 1968 was backed down by Norman Hunter so severely that the rangy Yugoslav lost six months of his prime.

Osim also bitterly criticized England last year, when substitute Semir Tucic was carried off with a bruised shin after 33 seconds.

Yugoslavia talked revenge. More sensibly Osim has since observed: "English and German players just run cold when faced with pure technical skill. Why should we insist on power-play and Rambo look-alikes when we have superb technicians?"

If that's the last word, if battle cries turn mumbled, Strasser and his men won't walk it, but they'll win.

POSTCARD The Not-So-Dolce Vita

By Mary Davis Suro

Rome—American expatriates who have succumbed to the charms of Rome realize that the passion for the city is subject to ups and downs. Sometimes it flames; sometimes it flickers. Right now it is burning low.

"These Americans who experienced la dolce vita," said Pepper, an American writer who has lived in Italy for more than 20 years, "are beginning to realize that life's not so dolce here anymore."

The dollar has lost more than 40 percent of its value here since 1985. The cost of everything—from fruits and vegetables to housing and dining out—is escalating. Gone are the days when a four-course meal with a bottle of wine was cheaper for Americans than eating at home; a good trattoria meal for two now costs $60 to $70. With real estate prices soaring to $7 and $8 a pound in many neighborhoods, even cooking at home has become a costly affair.

The inflation rate has hovered between 5 and 5.5 percent this year. But many long-term residents of the city look upon such data with skepticism. "I don't believe it when they say inflation is so low," said Mickey Knox, an actor who moved here in 1964. "Prices have risen outrageously in the past few years. I've lived in many European countries. Italy used to be the cheapest. Now it's the most expensive."

Mary-Ann Ray, an architect, is here on a one-year fellowship at the American Academy in Rome. She said she spends about $575 a month on supplies and little else. Although she brought savings of her own, she said, "I will absolutely go through all of my money. Because of the cost of my supplies I can never eat out, and I'm not able to travel much."

There are nearly 83,000 American citizens living in Italy and registered with the U.S. Embassy. "Many of the large multinational companies are not sending as many American families here because of the high cost of living," said Douglas Denby, president of the American Club of Rome, a business association.

Five years ago Americans made up 60 percent of the American Club, and Italians 40 percent. This year they are half and half. "We hope we can at least maintain the 50 percent," Denby said, "because after all, it is an American club." While American business people here have felt the impact of the dollar's nosedive, they are the most able to make the financial adjustments necessary to maintain a certain style of living. But for the artists, students and scholars who flocked to Rome because the city offered inspiration at a relatively low cost, there is no such thing as a coat of living allowance.

Rents can range from $1,000 a month for a fifth-floor walk-up in an old building in the historic center of the city, to $4,000 a month for a three-bedroom apartment in a more fashionable building nearby. One American bemoaned the fact that his gas bill was $385 a month last winter for a small five-room apartment.

And with gasoline at $4 a gallon, a round-trip airline ticket to Venice at $200, and a room at an average pension costing about $90 a night, there may not be much room in the budget for weekend getaways.

The trustees of the American Academy in Rome, a center for study and research in the fine arts and humanities, anticipated the financial difficulties faced by fellows living in Rome and alerted recipients last spring. "We knew already last year that the situation was not going to get better here," said the academy's director, James Melaher. "When we offered fellowships for this year we made it clear to recipients that it was going to cost them something. They were forewarned."

STILL, Rome will continue to draw those whose professional pursuits feed on the chaotic splendor of the city, even if the views now cost a good bit more.

"It's definitely worth it," said Kathy Mischelmann, a painter who is living here for a year. "All you have to do is walk out your door and you're ambushed by the beauty."

"I don't think Rome will lose its appeal to artistic types any more than New York City has, which is also outrageously expensive," Pepper said. "I think folks are just going to hang on here and do what they have to do to get by. Most people have been doing this for a long time, anyway."

Claude Nougaro: Vocal Athlete

By Mike Zwerin

International Herald Tribune

PARIS — For more than 30 years, Claude Nougaro—who calls himself a "black Greek," somewhere between Plato and Louis Armstrong"—has been a troubador of swing, adapting the chanson to his "blues à la Française."

He made the French language, which André Gide called "a lyrical and poetic language," swing to his lyrics on melodies like Dave Brubeck's "Blue Rondo à la Turk," Thelonius Monk's "Round Midnight" and his own "Blen, Blanc, Blues." He belted them like scriptures.

He has, however, decided to "change my blood type." He sold his house in Montmartre, fired his impresario, moved to another record company and made an album titled "Nougaro" (guess where), which might more accurately be called "Nougaro" with studio funk sharks like Nile Rodgers ("the Mozart of the synthesizer," says Nougaro), Marcus Miller and Mark Egan.

Bad mouths have said that Nougaro has more alcohol than blood in his veins; for years he was spotted out of joint all over town at all hours. And French jazz purists suspect that he is only yearning for greener commercial pastures. But he does give the impression of genuine renewal. He has been drinking tea lately, he looks remarkably young for 58 years, his eyes are clear, he expresses himself with the enthusiasm of someone in Rome, and he moves his short frame with the looseness of an in-shape boxer itching for his next match.

Last month, working a farewell gig with his jazz rhythm section (including Maurice Vander, piano, and Pierre Michelot, bass) at Le Petit Jardin in Montparnasse, he performed like the "vocal athlete" he says he is—wearing and bobbing across the small stage, dancing through upper partials worthy of Bobby McFerrin at breakneck tempo in 9/4 time. "The stage," he says, "is where I find my flavor." It's the enthusiastic customers, who could afford 320 francs for dinner, are part of the reason for the transfusion. Nougaro has tired of his friends telling him that their kids don't know who he is. He grew up in Toulouse, in southwestern France, which has a local tradition. His grandparents sang Bertiz and Wagner with neighborhood chorales. His father, Pierre, was a featured baritone with the Paris Opera for 20 years. When the teenage Claude was asked what he wanted to be when he grew up, he answered "a poet."

He read Baudelaire, Rimbaud and Victor Hugo and listened to Chopin. He was thrown out of several schools for "silly capers." He wanted to be a "warrior of the soul, an artistic and metaphysical adventurer," to "transform mankind." He listened to Piaf and Trenet and when he heard Bessie Smith, Armstrong and Nat King Cole, he discovered "another universe of expression made possible by the pure sound of language through the organic physiology of swing.

As a young adult bathing in the Existential heyday of Saint-Germain-des-Près, he heard Juliette Gréco sing songs by writers and poets like Boris Vian and Jacques Prévert. He saw that the great tradition of 19th-century French poetry had been "reduced to obscure texts read by tiny cliques having no influence whatsoever on mankind." Instead, he wrote songs of poems and sold them. After listening to Jacques Bréchet and Georges Brassens "express their individuality, their unique view of the world," by singing their own songs, he combined his bel canto background with his poetic fancies.

It is interesting to note that the tradition of contemporary pop singers performing their own material began with the French chanson about a decade before

Chuck Berry gave birth to rock 'n' roll by doing the same thing. Nougaro wrote about the night, the city, women, absence, solitude. He found the same "mental landscape" in Ravel and Ellington, in Schumann and Bud Powell. He began to "hear jazz with my eyes and see it with my ears. I was my own Pygmalion."

Although he has worked pretty much whenever he wanted for audiences from 300 to 5,000, he has never really been more than a star for connoisseurs. His records rarely hit six figures, and it is more accurate to say that his record company (Barclay) dropped him than to imply that the decision was his. In either case, last winter, considering himself to be among the unemployed, he went to New York for an concert fix. He owned the rights to Charles Mingus's "Fables of Faubus" and telephoned the composer's widow, Sue, when he got there. She was leaving town and lent him her apartment. "I found myself being guarded by Mingus's two basses — my faithful sentinels. And Dexter Gordon was living in the apartment downstairs. I figured New York was going to be good to me."

And so he reinvented himself once more. WEA Records signed him to record "Nougaro," which includes his version of the Mingus composition and is obviously inspired by Al Jarett's 1985 Chaka Khan. It could certainly compete with him if not that Nougaro is too French to even try to preserve his clan singing in English.

Though the album will be released in the United States, he has no illusions: "I am aware, with a certain sadness, that this beautiful language of mine which was once the planetary tongue has given way to English. On the other hand, I do not understand Portuguese, but when I hear great songs sung by great Brazilian singers I listen first to the swing and the melody and I am thrilled by its essence anyway. So I ask myself if my language, which for Americans is only sound without meaning, if that sound together with my emotion and intensity and the quality of my voice will be enough to conquer their indifference."

Cary Grant's Style Lives

Cary Grant had so much style, and the current Hollywood crowd so little, that the late actor was named one of America's 10 best-dressed men by the Tailors Council of America. The council's president, Jack Taylor, said the choice of Grant, who died last Nov. 29, "was necessitated due to the lack of any current motion picture actor who sartorially represented the motion picture industry." The Beverly Hills-based group also chose Senator Bob Dole, the Kansas Republican, as the sartorial predecessor in government, the television newsman Ted Koppel as best-dressed in the media, the basketball star Earvin (Magic) Johnson in sports, Lee Iacocca in industry, the comedian Don Rickles and the singer Andy Williams.

The Inamori Foundation of Japan awarded $45 million yen (about $335,000) each on Tuesday to an American professor of metallurgy, a Dutch astronomer and a Polish filmmaker for their contributions to science and creative arts. Annual Kyoto Prizes went to Morris Cohen, 75, professor emeritus of metallurgy at Massachusetts Institute of Technology, for research that the foundation said led to the development of ultra-high strength steels, shape-memory alloys and special ceramics; Jan Eickhoff Oort, 87, professor emeritus of Leiden University, for his contributions to the development of radio astronomy, discoveries about the shape and rotation of the Milky Way, and his study of supernovas; and Andrzej Wajda, 61, for contributing to the development of cinema art as director of a wide range of films appealing to human dignity and freedom. His movies include "Ashes and Diamonds," "Man of Marble" and "Man of Iron." The foundation was established three years ago by Kazuo Inamori, president of Kyocera Corp.

The Enrico Fermi Award, the U.S. Energy Department's highest award for scientific achievement in nuclear energy, will go this year to Luis W. Alvarez and Gerald F. Tappe. The award includes a gold medal, a presidential citation and $100,000 for each recipient. Alvarez, 76, retired professor of physics at the University of California at Berkeley, was cited for "the influence and breadth of his pioneering contributions" in several fields, including paleontology. He received the Nobel Prize in 1948. Tappe, 67, of Bethesda, Maryland, was cited for "contributions to the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons among other things. He is a member of the Atomic Energy Commission and former U.S. representative to the International Atomic Energy Agency. The award is named for Enrico Fermi, the Italian-born nuclear physicist."

The Danish soprano Ingeborg Sejersen performed like a real thing Monday night in making her debut with Royal Opera, Covent Garden in the premiere of a new production of Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio." Summoned to London at short notice last week to replace the ailing Hungarian soprano, Magda Nador, in the leading role of Konstanze, she went to stage still under the effects of heavy cold. Despite some problems with a few of the high notes, the two plaudits from a capacity audience. The conductor was Sir George Solti, the former music director of the Royal Opera, who celebrated his 75th birthday on Oct. 21.

Carlo Ponti, the 76-year-old producer, has been cleared by the Italian supreme court of the remaining charges against him in a fraud case. Ponti, the husband of the actress Sophia Loren, was accused by the state in 1978 of illegally exporting some $2 million in funds advanced to him to finance films exclusively in Italy. The state had appealed a 1981 verdict that ruled that he had no case to answer and ordered the release of his seized assets.

Zubin Mehta, music director of the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra, said in Warsaw that he hopes the orchestra's first trip to Poland will promote the reconciliation between Poles and Jews. Speaking in the ornate foyer of Warsaw's Grand Theatre, Mehta stressed the orchestra's ties to Poland, noting the many of the musicians are children of Polish Jews. "As musicians we know we cannot alter boundaries but we are capable of making people smile at each other," he said.
